PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A resolution of the Legislature of the Territory of Guam; to the Committee on Armed Services:

"Resolution 298

"Resolution relative to requesting and memorializing the Department of Defense and the U.S. Congress to extend to Guam the National Guard

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of the Territory of Guam:

"Whereas Guam is a vital defense installation in the free world and an important bastion in the battle line drawn between that world and that of Communist domination; and

"Whereas Guamarians have in large number enlisted in the Armed Forces of the United States and have served valiantly in such a capacity, thereby exemplifying the patriotism and good citizenship of the people of Guam; and

"Whereas in spite of the foregoing, the Territory has never enjoyed the benefit of being within the framework of the National Guard, thus lessening its effectiveness as a defense base and frustrating its desire to in every way take part in the national security effort: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Department of Defense and the United States Congress be and they are hereby respectfully requested and memorialized to initiate legislation whereby the Territory of Guam can take active part in the National Guard program; and be it further

"Resolved, That the recipients of this request consider it as an expression of the sincere desire of the people of Guam to in every way undertake the responsibilities and duties of their fellow Americans within the continental United States; and be it further

"Resolved, That the speaker certify to and the legislative secretary attest the adoption hereof and that copies of the same be thereafter transmitted to the Secretary of Defense, to the President of the Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the Governor of Guam."

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS OF ORGANIZATIONS OF STATE OF NEW YORK

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I submit, for appropriate reference, sundry petitions and memorials of organizations in the State of New York. I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petitions and memorials will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the petitions and memorials will be printed in the RECORD.

The petitions and memorials were received and referred as follows:

To the Committee on Appropriations:

"Whereas continued Federal spending at the present rate can only result in higher taxes or a larger deficit endangering the economic stability of our Nation: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Suffolk County Pomona Grange urge its representatives to examine carefully all Federal spending and approve only those that are essential for the general welfare of the United States.

"Passed by Suffolk County Pomona Grange meeting in Calverton on December 13, 1958.

"DORIS S. HALSEY,
"Secretary."

To the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"Whereas subsidies have been established to encourage infant industries and to encourage production in times of national emergency; and

"Whereas these subsidies, including those to farmers, have been continued long after the need has passed: Therefore be

"Resolved, That Suffolk County Pomona Grange urge the discontinuance of all farm and industrial subsidies in times of prosperity.

"Passed by Suffolk County Pomona Grange at Calverton December 13, 1958.

"DORIS S. HALSEY,
"Secretary."

"At the regular meeting of the New York State Soil Conservation Committee held at the Hotel Utica, Utica, N.Y., on December 1, 1958, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

" 'Whereas there is urgent need for information on water conservation, utilization and management in the northeast and for information on soil management and conservation as it relates to said water conservation, utilization and management; and

" 'Whereas such information can be obtained only through a well-coordinated regional program of research; and

" 'Whereas there is at present inadequate facilities and personnel at existing research stations to supply the needed information on soil and water conservation utilization, and management: Therefore be it

" 'Resolved, That the New York State Soil Conservation committee endorse in general the November 24, 1958, report on "Soil and Water Conservation Research Facility Needs in the Northeast" prepared by representatives of the Land Grant College Experiment Stations and that active support of this proposal be given by the committee in cooperation with other organizations in the Northeast; Be it further

" 'Resolved, That this resolution be forwarded to the national committee on soil and water conservation research facility needs appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture and to our Congressmen and other individuals and groups who are interested in soil and water conservation, development and use in the Northeast.'

"HARRY A. KERR,
"Executive Secretary."

To the Committee on Armed Services:

"Whereas the Navy Department has announced that it will close the Scotia Naval Supply Depot by December 31, 1959; and

"Whereas, said closing will terminate the employment of approximately 675 persons, many of whom are residents of the city of Amsterdam, N.Y.; and

"Whereas the loss of said employment by local residents and those living in the areas surrounding the city of Amsterdam, N.Y. affects the economic welfare of this community: It is therefore

"Resolved, by the Common Council of the City of Amsterdam, N.Y., that the Defense Department is hereby urged to give thorough reconsideration to the closing of the Scotia Naval Supply Depot and that all possible be done to preserve the jobs of this large group of employees; and be it further

"Resolved, That the city clerk forthwith forward certified copies of this resolution to the following: The Honorable Wilfred J. McNeil, Assistant Secretary of Defense, The Pentagon, Washington, D.C.; Senator JACOB K. JAVITS, 911 Park Avenue, New York, N.Y.; Senator-elect KENNETH B. KEATING, Rochester, N.Y.; Congressman-elect SAMUEL S. STRATTON, 51 Spruce Street, Schenectady, N.Y.; Governor-elect Nelson Rockefeller, New York City, N.Y.; H. E. Cole, commanding officer, Naval Supply Depot, Scotia, N.Y.

"Approved December 29, 1958.

"THOMAS F. GUGG,
"Mayor."

"RESOLUTION PROTESTING CLOSING OF NAVAL SUPPLY DEPOT AT SCOTIA, N.Y.

"Whereas recent information has been released indicating that the Federal Government plans to close the Naval Supply Depot, at Scotia, N.Y.; and

"Whereas it appears that said Naval Supply Depot is a place of employment of a number of residents of the county of Montgomery and of other nearby communities; and

"Whereas said Naval Supply Depot has been established at considerable cost to the Government and is still a modern and useable facility; and

"Whereas it appears that said Naval Supply Depot is located in what has been termed a depressed business area: Now, therefore, be and it hereby is

"Resolved, That the Montgomery County Board of Supervisors does hereby express its opposition to the closing of said Naval Supply Depot, as such closing is not in the best interest of the people of the county of Montgomery; and it is further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be mailed to the several United States Congressmen in the State of New York, and to Senators KEATING and JAVITS, with the request that they exert all efforts in order to obtain the continuance of said Naval Supply Depot, as the same is now maintained.

"TED A. PASTIK,
"Clerk, Board of Supervisors.
"WM. J. STEWART,
"County Attorney."

"RESOLUTION OF SULLIVAN COUNTY, N.Y., AMERICAN LEGION

"Whereas the 1957 American Legion National Convention urged the Congress of the United States to authorize the awarding of the Congressional Medal of Honor to the Four Army Chaplains of the Dorchester; and

"Whereas Congress has as yet taken no action on this matter: Therefore, be it

"Resolved by The American Legion in national convention assembled, September 1–4, 1958, in Chicago, Ill., That it does hereby urge the Congress of the United States to enact the necessary legislation for the purpose of authorizing the award, posthumously, to these four Army chaplains of the Congressional Medal of Honor as a suitable observance in commemoration of the deaths and heroic actions of these dedicated and courageous officers who acted above and beyond the call of duty and in accordance with the highest traditions of consecrated men of God."

"Whereas it has been brought to the attention of this Board that a certain contract between the Defense Department of the United States and Fairchild Engine & Airplane Corp. has been canceled by the Defense Department; and

"Whereas as a result of said cancellation of contract approximately 2,000 of Suffolk County residents have lost gainful employment and more particularly in the town of Babylon approximately 650 families have been deprived of their weekly earnings; and

"Whereas the economy of the County of Suffolk has been set back to the extent of approximately $200,000 per week, represented by the earnings of the discharged employees of Fairchild Engine & Airplane Corp.; and

"Whereas the loss of said payroll to this area will have an extremely adverse effect on other businesses and thereby directly affect the livelihood of many other persons engaged in local retail activity; and

"Whereas the economy and growth of this community has been developed primarily with the advent of the defense factories in the area upon which this community has grown to rely as a main source of revenue for the maintenance of our schools, churches, commercial and retail establishments, subcontracting manufacturing industries, service industries, and other branches of our economy too numerous to mention; and

"Whereas in the opinion of this Board the cancellation of the aforementioned contract will have a shocking effect on the whole of the economy of the town of Babylon and the county of Suffolk: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the supervisor be and hereby is directed to communicate with the President of the United States, Secretary of Defense McElroy, Senator Jacob Javits, Senator Kenneth Keating, Congressman Stuyvesant Wainwright, Gov. Nelson Rockefeller, State Senator Elisha T. Barrett, Assemblymen James R. Grover, Prescott Huntington, and Irving Price, and also Commissioner of the State Department of Commerce, for the purpose of informing them of the serious setback to the economy of the county of Suffolk, and more particularly in the town of Babylon, by reason of the Defense Department's cancellation of its contract with the Fairchild Engine & Airplane Corp., located at Deer Park, town of Babylon, county of Suffolk, and State of New York; and be it further

"Resolved, That the persons above named be requested to do all that is necessary and proper in order to effect the reinstatement of said contract, or, in the alternative, the awarding of such a contract to said Fairchild Engine & Airplane Corp. that will assist in the restoration of a stable economy within the town; and be it further

"Resolved, That the above named persons be requested to do all in their power to have the town of Babylon and surrounding communities of Suffolk and Nassau Counties be declared a distress area by reason of the population growth of said area due to the development of the defense installations upon which the economy of this area has to rely necessarily for its economic existence and which is required to stabilize the weekly income of the employees of said defense industries who are required to support our educational, religious, commercial, and industrial institutions and activities."

"Whereas there are various inequalities existing in the treatment and benefits of Reserves and Regulars in the Department of Defense; and

"Whereas in time of emergency there is (or at least should be) no discrimination between Regulars and Reservists in times of danger; and

"Whereas they are all endeavoring to protect the United States of America, according to the same orders from the commander-in-chief, and

"Whereas the Reservist sacrifices more than the Regular when serving on active duty, in that he is taken away from his normal way of life while the Regular is following his chosen way of making a living, and

"Whereas Congress has repeatedly endeavored to eliminate the inequalities erected by the services: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Queens County (N.Y.) Chapter of the Reserve Officers Association of the United States, in regular meeting assembled on the 19th day of November 1958, That we endorse the principle of equalization of benefits for Reserves and Regulars with special emphasis on endeavoring to secure legislation as embodied in H.R. 689 and S. 1085 of the 85th Congress and urge that similar bills be introduced and passed into law; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded through the Department of New York Convention to the National Convention, for determined and forceful action to obtain such legislation; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to our Congressmen and Senators urging them to work for the passage of such legislation.

"(The above resolution was adopted unanimously by the Queens County Chapter, ROA, on November 19, 1958.)

"ALBERT J. POWELL,
"Major, Arty-USAR, Secretary."

To the Committee on Finance:

"RESOLUTION ON GAS TAX INCREASE BY AUTOMOBILE CLUB OF NEW YORK, INC.

"Recent news stories report that serious consideration is being given to a State gas tax increase of 1 or 2 cents a gallon, without provision that the revenue from the proposed increase would be constitutionally dedicated to highway purposes exclusively. It is again being proposed by at least one proponent of such an increase, as it has been in the past, that this revenue be legislatively earmarked and placed in a highway fund account. This latter expedient, obviously, would be unacceptable to motorists in that it would have the effect of releasing highway user taxes collected on the present basis to other than highway purposes.

"In 1955, the voters of this State decisively rejected a highway bond issue that would have imposed a 2-cent-a-gallon gas tax increase. They did so because this gas tax increase was not constitutionally assured for highways. To attempt, again, to impose such an increase without dedicating the revenue for highways through a constitutional amendment would be running distinctly contrary to the already expressed will of the people.

"As a matter of fact, we know that the majority of the public is distinctly opposed to the use of any portion of the State's highway user tax revenue for other than highway purposes, and that given the opportunity to be heard on this issue, it would clearly demonstrate its desire to have constitutional protection for such revenue.

"Throughout the years, motorists have been vigorously opposed to the diversion of highway user taxes to nonhighway purposes, first, out of concern for our highway system and also as a matter of equity since, in addition to the special taxes they pay as motorists, they also share in paying all other taxes levied on the citizens of the State: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That this annual meeting of members of the Automobile Club of New York, Inc., in conformity with the policy taken by the New York State Automobile Association, reaffirms its opposition to any increase in the State's gasoline tax unless and until initial legislative steps are taken to submit to the people of the State a constitutional amendment dedicating all highway user tax revenue for highway purposes exclusively."

"Be it resolved, That Gowanda (N.Y.) Post 409, American Legion, at its regular meeting on November 20, 1958, does hereby go on record as being in favor of proposed legislation now in Congress to provide a pension of $100 a month to all veterans of World War I, II, and Korean action, who have attained an age of 62 years; and be it further,

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution, with an accompanying letter urging appropriate action, be forwarded to the Congressmen and Senators representing western New York at Washington, D.C."

RESOLUTION No. 2

"Whereas the vast number of retired and jobless railroad workers are in urgent need of increased benefits in order to keep up with the constantly rising cost of living; and

"Whereas benefits for those covered by social security were increased by the 85th Congress; and

"Whereas this same 85th Congress did not pass the necessary legislation to increase benefits under the Railroad Retirement Act and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the membership of the New York State Association, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen and Ladies' Auxiliary to the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, assembled in the city of Albany, N.Y., this 24th day of September 1958, go on record as being sorely disappointed in the failure of the 85th Congress to pass this legislation; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the United States Senators and Members of the House of Representatives, from the State of New York; and be it further

"Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives are hereby urged to give immediate and favorable attention to this problem when the 86th Congress convenes next.

"This committee recommends its approval.

To the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"RESOLUTION, UKRAINIAN CONGRESS COMMITTEE OF AMERICA, INC., BRANCH OF AMSTERDAM, N.Y., THE 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF A HEINOUS CRIME, PERPETRATED BY COMMUNIST MOSCOW IN UKRAINE

"The Communist empire of the Moscow dictators came into being, grew, spread, gained power, existed and exists by terror, genocide, and injustice, violating God's commandments and trampling the rights of man, enslaving, subjugating and destroying entire nations.

"Lenin, Stalin, Khrushchev—different names, but the same rule; different persons, but the same methods of a merciless dictatorship; an uninterrupted chain of crimes against mankind, based on relentless physical terror and mass murder.

"The massacre of the innocent population of the capital of Ukraine, Kiev, and her towns and villages in the spring of 1918—Lenin.

"The massacre of the population of Budapest and Hungarian towns and villages in the fall of 1956—Khrushchev.

"Murder in the King's palace of Baghdad in 1958—Khrushchev.

"Mass deportations and murder of the population of Ukrainian villages in the thirties—Stalin.

"Mass deportations of Ukrainian youth from their homeland to the deserts of Kazakhstan, now—Khrushchev. A chain with innumerable links.

"Lenin, Stalin, Khrushchev: Merely stages of Moscow's Communist imperialism, moves toward ever more perfect methods of aggression, toward subjugation of the entire world.

"Ukraine was the first one to experience Communist Moscow's aggression in its most deadly form. It paid for this experience with the loss of millions of people, and its nationally independent existence.

"This gathering is dedicated to the memory of one of the most horrible manifestations of Moscow's aggression: Twenty-five years ago Communist Moscow, in its role as occupant of Ukraine, committed a crime unprecedented in the history of mankind. It organized and fostered an artificial famine on the Ukrainian territories, thus destroying more than 6 million Ukrainians.

"Today, we observe the 25th anniversary of this tragedy. We honor the memory of the dead, and call the attention of the world to this dreadful crime perpetrated by Communist Moscow, at a moment when contemporary Moscow became a constantly growing menace to the free world, and to this great country of ours.

"We declare:

"Whereas Moscow's aggression began 40 years ago when it first attacked the then free and independent Republic of the Ukrainian People;

"Whereas the Ukrainians were the first to fight the aggressor and to defend their freedom and the right to their own territory;

"Whereas the Ukrainian people, by rendering stanch resistance, kept Moscow from subjugating the countries of Europe still feeble after the war, thus enabling them to live in freedom for many more years;

"Whereas Communist Moscow paralyzed the resistance of the Ukrainian population by means of terror and destruction and, in order to subdue the freedom-loving people, in 1932 and 1933, staged a manmade famine that exterminated more than 6 million Ukrainians;

"Whereas Communist Moscow perpetrated genocide in Ukraine and for this crime should be condemned by the free world;

"Whereas one of the accomplices in this crime and the organizer of other criminal activities committed in Ukraine, is the present dictator and responsible leader of the Communist Moscow empire;

"Whereas Communist Moscow, and especially its present dictators, used similar though less extensive methods of genocide after having occupied the territories of other nations;

"Whereas Communist Moscow's aggressive aspirations have become an ever-growing menace to all nations of the free world, and also to the freedom-loving and independent people in this great country of liberty; and

"Whereas the Ukrainian people who still struggle for freedom from captivity and for their own, independent state, should be rendered support and assistance by the free world.

"Now, therefore, we Americans of Ukrainian descent, at our gathering in Amsterdam, N.Y., on the 12th day of October, in commemoration of the 25th anniversary of the famine in Ukraine:

"1. Denounce before the free world and history this horrible crime, perpetrated by Communist Moscow on Ukrainian territory in consequence of which more than 6 million of our brothers and sisters starved to death.

"2. Pay our tribute to the memory of their sufferings, and join the Ukrainian people in mourning the victims of the famine.

"3. Call on the nations of the free world, above all the people of our great country of liberty, to condemn this crime perpetrated by Communist Moscow in Ukraine, and to do everything in their power to prevent Moscow from committing like crimes on their territories.

"4. Request the Government of our country and all governments in the free world to direct their representatives at the United Nations, to take action pertaining to the placement of the crime of genocide, committed by Communist Moscow in Ukraine, in 1932–33, on the agenda for discussion and the adoption of appropriate resolutions.

"5. Call on all countries in the free world to sign the Convention on Genocide.

"October 12, 1958.

Chairman.

"Whereas the present government of Red China depended for its creation and existence upon the blood of the innocent, and that no change in this policy has been effected by the leaders of Red China; and

"Whereas a nation which has been bathed in the blood of the innocent would be anathema to an organization whose entire purpose and existence is dedicated to the fostering and maintenance of international peace; and

"Whereas the present Red China regime represents a counterfeit rule dedicated to the purposes of the U.S.S.R. rather than to the peaceful progress and development of the rights and interests of the peoples of China; and

"Whereas the insincerity of the ruling officials of Red China is notorious in its lack of morals and respect for the inherent dignity of human beings; and

"Whereas Secretary John Foster Dulles has said in commenting upon Red China that 'such recognition and the seating of the Chinese Communists in the U.N. would so increase their prestige in the Far East * * * that the Communist subversive efforts would almost surely succeed': Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, that the New York Chapter Knights of Columbus, representing all members of the Knights of Columbus in the counties of Bronx and New York, in the city and State of New York, does hereby register its unalterable opposition to the consideration, much less the recognition, of membership in the United Nations for Red China; and be it further

"Resolved, That the President of the United States, the Secretary of State of the United States, the two United States Senators from the State of New York, the Members of the United States House of Representatives from the counties of the Bronx and New York, and our permanent representative to the United Nations to whom copies of this resolution shall be directed, are called upon to use the power of their respective offices to accomplish the necessary implementation of the foregoing resolution.

"JAMES E. FOLEY,
Chairman, Catholic Interest Committee, New York Chapter Knights of Columbus."

"Whereas the present government of Hungary depends for its existence upon the murderous and barbarous military forces of the U.S.S.R.; and

"Whereas the present government of Hungary is merely an alter ego or amanuensis of the Russian cult dedicated to the deprivation and oppression of the basic freedoms inherent to all peoples; and

"Whereas the United Nations General Assembly has previously declared Hungary to have been deprived of its liberty and political independence, and the people of their human rights, through the armed intervention of the U.S.S.R.; and

"Whereas true freedom of religion is nonexistent in Hungary as evidenced by the terroristic suppression and persecution of the Primate of Hungary, His Eminence Josef Cardinal Mindszenty: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, that the New York Chapter Knights of Columbus, representing all members of the Knights of Columbus in the Counties of Bronx and New York, in the City and State of New York, does hereby urge that the United Nations General Assembly immediately and overwhelmingly vote to reject the credentials of the representatives of the present Hungarian Government; and be it further

"Resolved, that the President of the United States, the Secretary of State of the United States, the two United States Senators from the State of New York, the Members of the U.S. House of Representatives from the Counties of the Bronx and New York, and our permanent representative to the United Nations to whom copies of this resolution shall be directed, are called upon to use the power of their respective offices to accomplish the necessary implementation and passage of the foregoing resolution.

"JAMES E. FOLEY.
"Chairman, Catholic Interest Committee, New York Chapter Knights of Columbus."

To the Committee on the Judiciary:

TEMPLE MENORAH,
Little Neck, N.Y., December 12, 1958.

Senator JACOB JAVITS,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. JAVITS: "Whereas various anti-American groups in various sections of this country have made statements calling for the obliteration of the Jews and other minorities; and

"Whereas these same groups have actually carried out bombings of Jewish houses of worship and integrated schools: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we, members of the Board of Trustees of Temple Menorah of Little Neck-Douglaston, call upon the Congress of the United States to enact into law the anti-dynamite bills proposed in the last session of Congress by Senator KENNEDY and Representative KEATING; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the United States Senators from New York State and our local Representative to Congress."

Sincerely,

WILLIAM KRAMBERG,
President.

"RESOLUTION OF BETH SHOLEM CONGREGATION OF CAMBRIA HEIGHTS JEWISH CENTER, CAMBRIA HEIGHTS, N.Y.

"We submit the following resolution for your immediate attention:

" 'Whereas certain revolutionary anti-American groups in various sections of this country have been making statements calling for the obliteration of the Jews and other minorities;

" 'Whereas these same groups have carried on actual bombings of Jewish houses of worship and have even threatened further such actions; be it

" 'Resolved, That we, the members of the board of directors of the Cambria Heights Jewish Center, call upon the properly constituted Federal law enforcement agencies to exert all immediate possible means to put an end to these criminal groups and their dastardly perpetrations which tend to undermine the basic democratic principles on which these United States were founded.'

"These following paragraphs were appended to the above resolutions and we trust you and your organizations will see fit to take appropriate action in this important situation: Be it further

" 'Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, Attorney General of the United States, local Congressmen, U.S. Senators from New York, to all Queens synagogues and temples; and be it further

" 'Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Long Island Daily Press.'

"MITCHELL J. DIAMOND,
"President.
"STANLEY M. KLEBANOFF,
"Chairman."

To the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

"Whereas State and local subdivisions can adequately finance public schools and can do so more economically than the Federal Government: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That Suffolk County Pomona Grange opposes any so-called school aid by the Federal Government.

"Passed by Suffolk County Pomona Grange meeting in Calverton on December 13, 1958.

"DORIS S. HALSEY,
"Secretary."

"Whereas congressional committees have brought to official light the fact known to most citizens, namely, that unscrupulous labor leaders are assuming dictatorial and criminal powers to the detriment of both union members and the country at large; and

"Whereas it appears that present Federal laws are inadequate to correct these abuses: Be it

"Resolved, That corrective legislation should get top priority in the next Congress.

"Passed by Suffolk County Pomona Grange meeting in Calverton on December 13, 1958.

"DORIS S. HALSEY,
"Secretary."

"STATE OF NEW YORK,
"Buffalo, N. Y., December 29, 1958

"Whereas the Niagara Frontier is in the throes of a prolonged critical unemployment situation, adversely affecting every man, woman, and child in the area; and

"Whereas according to the U.S. Department of Labor, this area has deteriorated from class 'E' to a class 'F' labor market, indicative of a very serious percentage of unemployed people with only a discouraging future outlook; and

"Whereas the unemployment, public assistance and welfare rolls continue their unabated upward trend, and industry is leaving this State at an alarming rate; and

"Whereas other areas, by highlighting the problem and joining diverse groups within their communities into a united front have successfully combated similar situations; and

"Whereas the leaders of industry, civic leaders, fraternal and charitable organizations, elected officials on city, county, State, and Federal level, retail merchants and business associations, members of the clergy, labor organizations, chambers of commerce and the family of every employed and unemployed person in the county of Erie vigorously protest the unemployment crisis in this area and the inadequate measures taken to alleviate a situation that directly or indirectly adversely affects every person in Erie County and surrounding environs: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That this board of supervisors memorialize the State legislature and the Congress of the United States to conduct a survey and investigation into the unemployment situation in Erie County; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chairman of this board of supervisors appoint a committee to work with the mayor's committee on full employment and assist Governor-Elect Rockefeller in his efforts to bring back full employment in New York State; and be it further

"Resolved, That the clerk of this board is hereby authorized and directed to forward certified copies of this resolution to the clerk of the assembly, secretary to the senate, the representatives of Erie County in the legislature and to the Senator and Congressmen representing Erie County in the Federal Government.

"Attest:

"LEON J. HINKLEY,
"Deputy Clerk of the Board of Supervisors of Erie County."

"Whereas the Niagara Frontier is in the throes of a prolonged critical unemployment situation adversely affecting every man, woman, and child in the area; and

"Whereas according to the U.S. Department of Labor, this area has deteriorated from a class 'E' to a class 'F' labor market, indicative of a very serious percentage of unemployed people with only a discouraging future outlook; and

"Whereas the unemployment, public assistance and welfare rolls continue their unabated upward trend; and

"Whereas other areas, by highlighting the problem and joining diverse groups within their community into a united effort, have successfully combated similar situations; be it

"Resolved, That the leaders of industrial, civic, labor, fraternal, and charitable organizations, elected officials on city, county, State, and Federal levels, retail merchants and business associations, members of the clergy, chambers of commerce, and the family of every employed and unemployed person in the counties of Erie and Niagara protest vigorously the deplorable unemployment crisis in this area, and the inadequate measures taken to alleviate a situation that directly or indirectly adversely affects every person in Niagara and Erie counties and the surrounding environ; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies be sent to Earl Brydges, Senator, Ernest Curto and Harold Altro, Assemblymen, William E. Miller, Congressman, Kenneth Keating and Jacob Javits, Senators.

"The resolution was adopted."

To the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service:

"RESOLUTION CONCERNING PROPOSED INCREASED RATES ON FOURTH-CLASS MAIL

"Whereas several of our major industries and retailers utilize fourth-class mail almost exclusively in the distribution of their products; and

"Whereas in competition with other markets postage increases cannot be passed on to the consumer and therefore become an increased cost of operation which must be absorbed; and

"Whereas each increase in rate for parcel post results in loss of revenue to the Post Office Department through diversion of mail to other carriers; and

"Whereas the Postmaster General has not exercised his authority to reform parcel post sizes and weights thereby regaining the $73 million of revenue lost as a result of Public Law 199; and

"Whereas the Congress in the last session passed legislation creating certain credits which would have an effect on cost of fourth-class mail that has not been taken into account in constructing the proposed rate schedule; and

"Whereas the public service value of second-, third-, and fourth-class post office costs over revenue have not been calculated or applied; and

"Whereas there is no other public entity which can provide a small parcel delivery service universally to service the American people at reasonable cost; and

"Whereas the Appropriations Committee has not had time to act in accordance with the directives of the Congress in evaluating the amount of credit applicable:

"Therefore, the Newark Chamber of Commerce goes on record as opposed to the proposed schedule as being out of all reasonable proportion:

"(A) The rates are not uniformly progressive which upsets the entire basic rate structure which has been in effect for many years.

"(B) The proposed schedule places an unnecessary burden on the lower zones and lighter weight packages.

"(C) This proceeding should be deferred until full supporting evidence is made available and until factors have been considered and reflected in the rates proposed.

"Adopted October 21, 1958.

"NEWARK CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
"JOHN D. MEYERS,
"Secretary-Treasurer."

Mr. JAVITS submitted miscellaneous petitions and memorials.

Also introduced several bills for appropriate reference.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I send to the desk three bills, with explanations of each one, and ask that they be printed in the body of the RECORD. They are very important measures.

EIGHTH ANNUAL REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON DEFENSE PRODUCTION (S. REPT. NO. 1)

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Joint Committee on Defense Production, submitted a report entitled "Eighth Annual Report of the Activities of the Joint Committee on Defense Production," pursuant to section 712 (b) of the Defense Production Act of 1950, which was ordered to be printed.

SUMMARY OF MONTHLY PERSONNEL REPORTS ON CIVILIAN EMPLOYMENT—JOINT COMMITTEE ON REDUCTION OF NONESSENTIAL FEDERAL EXPENDITURES

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, as chairman of the Joint Committee on

Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures, I submit a summary of monthly personnel reports on civilian employment in the executive branch of the Federal Government issued during the recess of the Congress. These reports were concerned with employment and payrolls during the period June–November 1958 inclusive.

In accordance with the practice of several years' standing, I request that it be printed in the body of the RECORD as a part of my remarks, together with a statement by me.

There being no objection, the summary of reports and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BYRD

Civilian employment in the executive branch of the Federal Government decreased 12,387 during the period June through November 1958. The total in June was 2,367,104. In November there were 2,354,717 civilian employees.

Employment by civilian agencies of the Federal Government showed a net decrease of 7,699 during the period from June through November 1958, decreasing from 1,269,938 in June to 1,262,239 in November. Civilian employment in the Department of Defense decreased 4,688 during the same period, dropping from 1,097,166 in June to 1,092,478 in November.

In the Department of Defense white collar employment decreased 7,845 from 579,855 in June to 572,010 in November, and industrial employment increased 3,157 from 517,311 in June to 520,468 in November.

In May the Federal civilian payroll was running at an annual rate of $11,308 million, and in October it was running at an annual rate of $12,821 million.

These figures summarize compilations of monthly personnel reports, certified by executive agencies to the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures since Congress adjourned August 23, 1958.

In addition to this regularly reported civilian employment, there were foreign nationals working under U.S. military agencies overseas, excluded from usual personnel reporting, whose services are provided by contractual agreement between the U.S. and foreign governments, or because of the nature of their work or the source of funds from which they are paid. These numbered 216,695 in June and 203,409 in November, a decrease of 13,286.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL AIRPORT ACT

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE], the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE], the Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH], the Senator from Alaska [Mr. BARTLETT], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. CANNON], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING], the Senator froh Michigan [Mr. HART], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JACKSON], the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. JORDAN], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. MCGEE], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], the Senator from Utah [Mr. MOSS], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON], and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG], I introduce a bill for Federal aid to aviation. This bill, which has 40 cosponsors, is designed to eliminate the present horse-and-buggy national airport system and to make a wise investment in the future of aviation. To insure our progress in the air, we must ready this Nation for the jet age. If we can afford $38 billion—which I favor—for a national superhighway system, on a 90–10 matching basis, we dare not neglect the dynamic and current needs of aviation, which would require, on a 50–50 matching basis, only $100 million a year for 5 years, with a $75 million emergency fund to prepare our airfields for the jet air traffic of today and the future.

I ask unanimous consent that, accompanying my statement, I may have printed at this point in the RECORD an explanation of the proposed amendments to the Federal Airport Act, and that the bill may lie at the desk until the close of business today for the addition of the names of other sponsors, without prejudice to its being introduced first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The bill (S. 1) to amend the Federal Airport Act in order to extend the time for making grants under the provisions of such act, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MONRONEY for himself and other Senators was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The statement submitted by Mr. MONRONEY is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MONRONEY

This bill, entitled "A bill to amend the Federal Airport Act in order to extend the time for making grants under the act, and for other purposes," is practically identical to S. 3502 which was passed by the Senate in 1958 without a dissenting vote. S. 3502 was later passed by the House with some changes and vetoed by the President.

The Federal Airport Act was originally enacted in 1946. In 1955 it was extended and amended to authorize the obligation of $63 million annually to provide matching funds to local authorities for the construction and improvement of our national airport system. The present act expires June 30, 1959.

This bill provides for the following:

1. It extends the act through fiscal year 1964—a period of 5 years—at an increased level of $100 million annually in comparison with the present $63 million level, on a matching-fund basis.

2. It provides for a separate special fund of $75 million for discretionary allocation beginning July 1, 1959, also on a matching-fund basis. This fund can be used without regard to the limitations of State apportionment requirements.

3. It eliminates parking lots and certain concession areas in terminal buildings from eligible Federal matching funds.

4. It provides for Federal assistance on a matching-fund basis to certain small airports for the sealing and filling of joints on runway pavements.

5. It requires publication by January 1 of each year of the proposed program of airport developments for the next fiscal year.

SCHOOL SUPPORT ACT OF 1959

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senators BYRD of West Virginia, CANNON, CHAVEZ, CHURCH, CLARK, COOPER, DODD, ENGLE, GREEN, GRUENING, HENNINGS, HUMPHREY, JACKSON, KEFAUVER, KERR, LANGER, MAGNUSON, MANSFIELD, MARTIN, MCGEE, MCNAMARA, MONRONEY, MORSE, MOSS, NEUBERGER, RANDOLPH, and SMITH, I introduce, for appropriate reference, the School Support Act of 1959. The purpose of this bill is to strengthen the financial structure of our public schools by authorizing appropriation of funds to the States, on a grant basis, for construction of school facilities, payment of teachers' salaries, or a combination of these two purposes, as each State sees fit.

The number S. 2 has been reserved for this bill, to emphasize the priority which it should, and I trust will, receive in this Congress. Companion legislation has been introduced in the other house by my colleague from Montana, Representative LEE METCALF. This bill is substantially the same as the Murray-Metcalf bill (S. 3311) in the 85th Congress.

S. 2 authorizes appropriation, in the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1959, of $25 for each school-age child—between the ages of 5 to 17, inclusive; $50 per child the second year; $75 the third year; and $100 the fourth and each succeeding year. This authorization amounts to $1.1 billion the first year, $2.2 billion the second year, $3.4 billion the third year, and $4.7 billion the fourth year. A table I shall insert at the conclusion of these remarks shows how much money would go to each State.

These are large sums of money. They are large because the need is great. Right now the Nation has a shortage of more than 135,000 classrooms. Based on an average construction cost of $40,000 per classroom, as estimated by the U.S. Office of Education, $5.4 billion is needed merely to construct the classrooms needed during the present school term.

There is also a shortage of approximately 135,000 teachers. We need that many teachers to reduce class sizes to manageable proportions, for replacement of retiring teachers or others leaving the profession, for increased enrollment, sufficient additional staff trained in particular fields, such as mathematics and science, and to replace persons who are unqualified to teach.

Mr. President, in view of the great need I have cited for an adequate program of Federal education support, it is appalling that the President, in his state of the Union message just delivered, has asked that we simply study, in some new kind of commission, the needs of education. What mockery that proposal is. He says we need a national goal. I will tell him right now what that goal is. We must provide safe, suitable, and adequate education for the schoolchildren of America.

To begin to meet that goal, we need 135,000 classrooms and 135,000 teachers to meet present shortages, and the teachers need salaries that will permit them to continue in their profession. It is a tragic thing when an administration is so far removed from reality and public opinion that it does not recognize the need for leadership now in the field of education, not a return to one of Herbert Hoover's 1931 formulas for delaying any action. I intend to do all within my power to see that the Congress furnishes the leadership which the President has abdicated.

The teachers of this country's public school children are as badly underpaid as they are badly overworked. The average salary of classroom teachers for 1958–59 is estimated at $4,775. One classroom teacher out of six receives less than $3,500 annually. I hope all Senators will think for a moment about that stark fact. There are 1,292,000 classroom teachers in our public schools. Of that total, almost one-quarter of a million receive a gross weekly salary, over a 40-week period, of $87.50, or less. And, of course she or he is expected to save up enough, during the school year, to go to summer school and earn enough credits to return to teaching and, frequently, coaching, counseling, and otherwise devoting practically every waking hour either to the job itself or to extracurricular, noncompensated duties.

The Nation should be ashamed of the shabby way it is treating its teachers, as well as its schoolchildren. I say it is time to do something about this; and we can do so by prompt passage of Senate bill 2 and subsequent appropriations.

While the perennial opponents of this kind of legislation will no doubt again cry doomfully that this bill means Federal control of education, reasonable men can agree that, on the contrary, the passage of the bill will give the local school boards actual, instead of only nominal, control of education. A school district which is bonded to the limit, and is holding classes in churches and community halls, and is taking any teachers it can get, despite their lack of qualifications, does not have control of education. This bill would give to the States funds which could provide both the classrooms and the salaries necessary to return actual control of education to districts such as I have described, and to assure that other districts faced with similar situations will be able to retain control of education.

Some persons hold that State and local spending for schools is inherently good, and that Federal spending for schools is inherently bad. This fallacy is cultivated by the self-interest groups that have as their primary goal the reduction of taxes, regardless of what may happen to our school system. Some of the same persons regard a balanced Federal budget as a sacred thing, but look the other way when it is pointed out that some State and local governments are in much worse shape financially.

Between 1948 and 1957, State and local governments increased revenues by 119 percent, but their bonded indebtedness increased by 182 percent. During the same period, Federal revenues increased 81 percent, but Federal indebtedness increased by only 7.2 percent.

As a percentage of national income, our national debt dropped from 113 percent, in 1948, to 74 percent, in 1957. Thus, in terms of our national income, our national debt has been cut by almost 40 percentage points during the past decade.

In 1948, our national income was $223.5 billion. By 1957 it had risen to $364 billion. In 1948, our national debt was $252 billion. By 1957 it had risen to $270 billion. Thus, as a Nation we are like the man who 10 years ago bought a house with a $6,000 mortgage when he made $5,000 a year. He recently bought a bigger house which had a $7,000 mortgage; however, his salary is now more than $8,000 a year. He obviously is in a much better position to pay for his new house. And he certainly is in a better position than the man who, like many local school districts, is in debt so far, according to his ability to pay, that the banker waves him out the door.

Assuming that school financing must be done on borrowed money, let us compare the cost of borrowing money by Federal, State, and local governments. Since 1957, yields on high-grade municipal bonds, which include school bonds, have been consistently higher than those on Federal bonds. As of November 1958, high-grade municipal bonds sold at 3.84 percent, while long-term Federal bonds sold at 3.70 percent interest. This is despite the fact that interest on Federal bonds is taxable and the interest on State and local bonds is tax exempt.

The exemption from Federal taxes is also costing the Federal Government a considerable sum annually, through the loss of Federal income tax on these tax-exempt bonds. This tax exemption—a back-door type of Federal subsidy—is proving insufficient to assure State and local government preferential interest rates, among competitive types of securities on the market.

If a taxpayer happens to live in a school district that has already strained itself to provide school buildings for a growing number of children, and as a result has a low rating for bonding purposes, he may have to pay interest rates that are 20 percent or more higher than those required if his Federal Government had borrowed money to build the same school buildings. If a taxpayer happens to live in a school district that has reached its bonding capacity, but where there is still an urgent need for additional classrooms, the taxpayer is unable to provide for educating children in his community.

Mr. President, many of us on both sides of the aisle are persuaded that the Federal Government should act now, during this session, to bolster education by the kind of a program which Senate bill 2 provides. In the light of what I am about to say, I want to make it clear, so as to avoid any possible embarrassment to my friends across the aisle who support this proposed legislation, that I am speaking only for myself, and not for all the cosponsors and other supporters of this bill. But because of the outcries sure to come from opponents of school-support legislation, it is necessary to take the halo off the balanced budget which the administration permitted a peek at a few weeks ago.

The so-called balanced budget may actually be the most out-of-balance budget in the history of our Republic. While the entire budget has not been unveiled, it may be out of balance with the basic needs of our Nation. It may be out of balance with both domestic and foreign needs, with our present and future and our growing population. It may be out of balance with the needs of our economy; in fact, it may be out of balance with everything except an estimate of revenue for the next fiscal year. And this estimate is out of balance with the revenue that our national economy should be supporting, and would be supporting if the administration had the vision and courage and confidence to implement the Employment Act of 1946 and otherwise furnish the leadership the United States deserves.

What kind of blindness affects us, that we see so clearly the need for planes and rockets to protect the free world, but fail to see the need to provide teachers and classrooms for the children of a free people?

However, even those who would sacrifice investments in human beings for investments in military hardware must be sobered by the reports on Soviet education. Last year, Commissioner of Education Lawrence Derthick spent some time inspecting the Soviet educational system. Upon his return he said:

> What we have seen has amazed us in one outstanding particular; we were simply not prepared for the degree to which the U.S.S.R. as a nation, is committed to education as a means of national advancement. Everywhere we went we saw indication after indication of what we could only conclude amounted to a total commitment to education. Our major reaction therefore is one of astonishment * * * at the extent to which this seems to have been accomplished. * * *
> We saw no evidence of any teacher shortage. Teacher workloads and other working conditions are advantageous. Teacher prestige is high. Salaries are at the levels of those of doctors and engineers. * * * Only the best are chosen to teach—one out of six who apply.

In the light of these Soviet accomplishments, we can ill afford to lie back and neglect our obligation to the children of America and the future strength of the Nation.

Mr. President, no Senator need oppose or fail to support this bill because he thinks that his constituency is opposed to Federal support for schools. An objective study of public opinion polls made since 1950 shows that an ever-increasing percentage of the American people are in favor of Federal support for education.

In 1957, George Gallup reported, after conducting an opinion poll on a Federal-aid measure, that every major segment of our population was in favor of it, and that not any major segment polled was less than 70 percent in favor of it.

A Roper poll also conducted in 1957 showed 73 percent of the American population to be in favor of Federal aid for schools. In reporting on results of his poll, Elmo Roper concluded:

> If the Federal Government were to take its courage in both hands and decide tomorrow morning that our crippling educational shortages were something for which it must now take a heavy measure of responsibility * * * the heavens would not fall. More people favor such a course than favor any other single one.

Mr. President, no Senator need oppose this bill or fail to support it because he believes that this measure would in any way hinder the local and State control of our public schools. On the contrary, this measure will bolster and strengthen State and local control of our schools and make it a reality.

No Senator need fail to support this bill because he believes that Federal support for education is new and unprecedented. The bill I am introducing today has ample precedent.

To cite but one precedent, the Northwest Ordinance of 1785 was enacted under the Articles of Confederation 3 years before our Federal Constitution was ratified. In this ordinance, our Founding Fathers set aside the 16th section of land in every township in the new Territories for the maintenance of public schools. The proceeds from the 16th section were the original nest egg that established the public schools in my own State of Montana, as happened in many other States. For the first few decades in the history of Montana these funds provided a substantial percentage of the monetary support for public schools. Even today the proceeds from school lands amount to more than 10 percent of the total operating expenditures for public schools in Montana. The same is true for many of the other States.

Federal financial support for education is not new; indeed, it is older than our Republic. The bill introduced today would not launch the Nation on a new and adventuresome program; it would merely intelligently build on the foundation laid down long ago by our Founding Fathers.

Many sitting in this Chamber today owe much of their own education to the national endowment of public schools established by the foresight of our Nation's founders. Can we who owe so much fail to invest, in turn, in the education of our own children and grandchildren?

The minimum birthright our Nation owes to all American children is the opportunity to be taught by competent, well-trained teachers in safe and suitable schools. To continue to deprive large numbers of our youth of their minimum birthright is to perpetuate a national shame.

We must remember, however, that good teachers and suitable classrooms, the fundamental ingredients of quality education, are infinitely more than the birthright of our children. They are also the best and most fundamental investment that we can make in our vigor as a free people, in our continued economic growth, in our defense potential, and in our continued leadership in the free world.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, immediately following these remarks, the text of Senate bill 2 and a table showing the estimated allotments to individual States under the bill, and that the bill be held on the table until January 15, so that other Senators may, if they wish, join in cosponsoring the bill. Let us hope that this is the year in which Congress will act in behalf of the school children of America.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and table will be printed in the RECORD, and the bill will lie on the table, as requested by the Senator from Montana.

The bill (S. 2) to provide financial assistance for the support of public schools by appropriating funds to the States to be used for constructing school facilities and for teachers' salaries, introduced by Mr. MURRAY (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.,

SHORT TITLE

SEC. 1. This act may be cited as the "School Support Act of 1959."

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE OF ACT

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that despite sustained and vigorous efforts by the States and local communities, which have increased current school construction to unprecedented levels and which have increased expenditures for teachers' salaries, there is still a serious shortage of classrooms and of qualified teachers which requires immediate action on the part of the Federal Government. The financial resources available to many communities are inadequate to support construction programs sufficient to eliminate classroom shortages, and practically all communities face the problem of providing compensation to teachers commensurate with the salaries received by persons with comparable education, experience, and responsibilities. These inadequacies are seriously restricting the quality of the educational program of the Nation.

The Congress strongly affirms that the control of the personnel, program of instruction, formulation of policy, and the administration of the Nation's public elementary and secondary schools resides in the States and local communities. The Congress also affirms that a major portion of the responsibility for financing the costs of these schools resides in the States and local communities.

However, the Congress recognizes that without sufficient financial resources at their disposal to provide necessary educational facilities and to employ competent teaching personnel, the control of our Nation's schools is not directed by State and local school boards but is dictated by the harsh demands of privation. Without the means to pay for alternatives, school boards have no freedom of choice.

In order to provide State and local school boards with actual, as well as nominal, control of schools, the Congress has the responsibility for appropriately sharing in their financial support. The purpose of this act, therefore, is to provide Federal financial support to help meet both the immediate and continuing problems of financing adequate school facilities and teachers' salaries and thereby to strengthen the schools of the Nation.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 3. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1959, and for succeeding fiscal years, amounts equal to the product of the estimated number of the school-age population of all the States as of such year and the following amounts: For the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1959, $25; for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1960, $50; for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1961, $75; and for each fiscal year thereafter, $100.

ALLOTMENTS TO STATES

SEC. 4. (a) The Commissioner shall allot for each fiscal year to each State, from the total amount appropriated for such year pursuant to section 3, an amount which bears the same ratio to such total as such State's estimated school-age population bears to the total estimated school-age population of all such States, subject to such adjustments, if any, as result from the application of section 8.

(b) The State education agency of each State which desires to receive an allotment under the provisions of this act shall specify annually to the Commissioner the proportion of its State's allotment that will be expended for each of the two purposes: (1) School construction and (2) teachers' salaries.

SCHOOL CONSTRUCTION PORTION

SEC. 5. The State education agency of each State which desires to use a portion of its allotment under this act for the construction of school facilities shall certify to the Commissioner that such funds allocated within the State for this purpose will be—

(1) Expended solely for the construction of school facilities in school districts in accordance with this act; and

(2) So distributed that priority is given to school districts which have the greatest need for additional school facilities and which in terms of the economic resources available to them are least able to finance the cost of needed school facilities.

TEACHERS' SALARY PORTION

SEC. 6. The State education agency of each State which desires to use a portion of its allotment under this act for teachers' salaries shall certify to the Commissioner that such funds allocated within the State for this purpose will be—

(1) Distributed among its school districts to be used solely for teachers' salaries and

(2) So distributed that each school district in the State will receive at least three-fourths of the amount which bears the same ratio to the total portion of the States allotment specified for teachers' salaries under section 4(b) as the number of teachers in each school district bears to the number of teachers of all the school districts in the State.

VERIFICATION OF EXPENDITURES

SEC. 7. The State education agency shall verify annually to the Commissioner that funds received under this act were distributed and expended in accordance with the provisions of this act.

MAINTENANCE OF STATE AND LOCAL FINANCIAL SUPPORT OF SCHOOLS

SEC. 8. (a) The amount allotted to any State under section 4 for any year shall be reduced by the percentage (if any) by which its State school effort index for such year is less than the national school effort index for such year, with the exception that during the first 3 years that allotments are made this provision shall not be applicable. The total of such reductions shall be reallotted among the remaining States by proportionately increasing the amounts allotted to them under section 4 for such year.

(b) For purposes of subsection (a)—

(1) the "State School Effort Index" for any State for a fiscal year is the quotient obtained by dividing (A) the revenue for schools per public school child for the State by (B) the personal income per child of school age for the State; except that the State school effort index shall be deemed to be equal to the national school effort index in the case of Hawaii, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Guam, Wake Island, American Samoa, and the District of Columbia.

(2) the "National School Effort Index" for any fiscal year is the quotient obtained by dividing (A) the revenue for schools per public school child for the total States of the Union by (B) the personal income per child of school age for the total States of the Union.

(c) (1) The revenue for schools per public school child for any State for purposes of determining its State school effort index for any fiscal year means the quotient obtained by dividing (A) the total current revenue receipts derived from State and local sources in the State for support of elementary and secondary education, as determined by the Commissioner on the basis of data for the most recent school year for which satisfactory data for the several States are available to him, by (B) the number of children in average daily attendance in public elementary and secondary schools in such State, as determined by the Commissioner for such most recent school year.

(2) The revenue for schools per public school child for the total States of the Union for purposes of determining the national school effort index for any fiscal year means the quotient obtained by dividing (A) the total current revenue receipts derived from State and local sources for support of elementary and secondary education in the total States of the Union, as determined by the Commissioner for the same school year as is used under paragraph (1), by (B) the number of children in average daily attendance for such year in public elementary and secondary schools in the total States of the Union, determined as provided in paragraph (1).

(3) The income per child of school age for the several States and for the total States of the Union shall, for purposes of subsection (b), be determined by the Commissioner on the basis of the personal income per child of school age for the most recent year for which satisfactory data are available from the Department of Commerce.

LABOR STANDARDS

SEC. 9. (a) The State education agency shall give adequate assurance to the Commissioner that all laborers and mechanics employed by contractors or subcontractors in the performance of work on school construction financed in whole or in part under this act will be paid wages at rates not less than those prevailing on similar construction in the locality as determined by the Davis-Bacon Act, as amended (40 U.S.C. 276a–276a–5).

(b) With respect to the labor standards specified in subsection (a) of this section the Secretary of Labor shall act in accordance with Reorganization Plan Numbered 14 of 1950 (15 F.R. 3176; 64 Stat. 1267), and section 2 of the act of June 13, 1934, as amended (40 U.S.C. 276c).

APPROPRIATION FOR ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 10. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare such sums as may be necessary for the administration of this act.

ASSURANCE AGAINST FEDERAL INTERFERENCE IN SCHOOLS

SEC. 11. In the administration of this act, no department, agency, officer, or employee of the United States shall exercise any direction, supervision, or control over policy determination, personnel, curriculum, program of instruction, or the administration of any school or school system.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 12. For purposes of this Act—

(a) The term "Commissioner" means the United States Commissioner of Education.

(b) The term "State" means a State, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, Guam, Virgin Islands, Wake Island, American Samoa and the District of Columbia.

(c) The term "State education agency" means the State board of education or other agency or officer primarily responsible for the State supervision of public elementary and secondary schools, or, if there is no such officer or agency, an officer or agency designated by the governor or by State law.

(d) The term "school district" means any public-school administrative unit in a city, county, township, school district or other political subdivision in a State that is under the direction of a board of education or other legally constituted local school authority having administrative control and direction over tax-supported public education.

(e) The term "school facilities" means classrooms and related facilities (including furniture, equipment, machinery, and utilities necessary or appropriate for school purposes) for education which is provided by a school district for elementary or secondary education, in the applicable State, at public expense and under public supervision and direction; and interests in land (including site, grading, and improvement) on which such facilities are constructed.

(f) The terms "constructing" and "construction" mean the preparation of drawings and specifications for school facilities; erecting, building, acquiring, altering, remodeling, improving, or extending school facilities; and the inspection and supervision of the construction of school facilities.

(g) The term "child of school age" means a child who is between the ages of 5 and 17, both inclusive.

(h) The term "school-age population" means that part of the population which is between the ages of 5 and 17, both inclusive, as determined on the basis of either the actual or estimated population between such ages for the most recent year for which satisfactory data are available from the Department of Commerce.

(i) The term "teacher" means any member of the instructional staff of a public school district as defined by the education agency of each State.

(j) The term "teachers' salaries" means the monetary compensation paid to teachers for services rendered in connection with their employment.

The table presented by Mr. MURRAY is as follows:

Estimated allotments to individual States under the Murray-Metcalf bill for school years, 1959–60, 1961–62, and 1962–63, based on projections of each State's school-age population (5 to 17 years) for these years

RULES OF INTERPRETATION GOVERNING QUESTIONS OF THE EFFECT OF ACTS OF CONGRESS ON STATE LAWS

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Mr. President, for myself, the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], and 28 others of my colleagues, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to establish rules of interpretation governing questions of the effect of acts of Congress on State laws.

The bill is co-sponsored by Senators BRIDGES, THURMOND, HOLLAND, MARTIN, ROBERTSON, HILL, BENNETT, SPARKMAN, RUSSELL, MUNDT, SCHOEPPEL, YOUNG of North Dakota, LONG, BIBLE, STENNIS, HICKENLOOPER, WILLIAMS of Delaware, TALMADGE, SMATHERS, BUTLER, CURTIS, ERVIN, GOLDWATER, FULBRIGHT, ELLENDER, JORDAN, BYRD of Virginia, CAPEHART, and EASTLAND.

This bill is identical in language with an amendment in the nature of a substitute which many of us offered to Senate bill 654, the so-called Bridges bill, on August 20, 1958, in the last session of Congress.

It will be recalled that a motion to recommit that bill was carried, I believe by a vote of 41 to 40. This is a bill which is identical with the amendment which was offered then as a substitute, except for two clarifying language changes. It is identical to House bill 3 in the last session of Congress, which passed the House of Representatives.

The bill is also known as the Federal anti-preemption bill. I shall not discuss it in detail, but I point out that it is designed to correct the situation which exists under present rulings of the United States Supreme Court, to the effect that where Congress has enacted legislation on any subject, the States are deprived of the power to enact or enforce similar laws on the same subject, even though not in conflict with a Federal statute.

To correct this situation the bill would do two things. First, acts of Congress would not repeal State laws or nullify them, or preempt a field of legislation unless Congress specifically so provided.

Second, State laws would not be declared by the Supreme Court as being ineffective and incapable of enforcement, unless they were in inreconcilable conflict with the Federal law.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill may lie on the desk until the close of business on next Monday in order that other Senators who may desire to do so may join as sponsors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Arkansas.

The bill (S. 3) to establish rules of interpretation governing questions of the effect of acts of Congress on State laws, introduced by Mr. MCCLELLAN (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PADRE ISLAND NATIONAL PARK

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to create Padre Island National Park in the State of Texas. Most of us are keenly aware of the fact that one of America's greatest recreation resources is our public shoreline. But, unfortunately, in many sections of the country the shoreline has vanished from public use.

A national survey of our coastlines shows that of the 3,700 miles of shoreline constituting the Atlantic and gulf coasts, only 240 miles are in Federal and State ownership for public recreation use; and more than half of that 240 miles is embraced in the Cape Hatteras National Seashore Recreation Area, in North Carolina; the Acadia National Park, in Maine; and the Everglades National Park, in Florida; and none of those national parks contains much beach frontage that is suitable for seashore recreation. Not enough land is available for this purpose. With the great population increases and the industrial growth of our country, tens of millions of future Americans will be deprived of public use of beaches if we do not act now.

Mr. President, in this country very few areas of undeveloped beach line are still available for public use. One of the great, undeveloped beaches of the country is Padre Island, a beautiful stretch of sand which extends the southernmost 115 miles of the Texas coast along the Gulf of Mexico. The island's width ranges from one-third to one-half a mile; and one tip of it, Padre Beach, is already under commercial resort development.

Mr. President, Texas has the longest coast line on the Atlantic and the gulf coasts—367 miles.

There is no question that as a national park, Padre Island would become the winter park of America, just as Yellowstone, Yosemite, Glacier National, and the Great Smoky Mountains are summer playgrounds.

National Park Board officials say that Padre Island is one of the unique natural regions of America, in that its combination of geology, scenery, climate, and wildlife cannot be duplicated anywhere else in the Nation. It is the last substantial strip of American coastline still almost entirely in its natural state, undeveloped or unchanged from its condition in the very early days of this country.

Looked at from a standpoint of historical interest, Padre Island is one of the closest links the United States has with the past, for it was there that one of the earliest explorers set foot on New World soil. The explorer, Alonso Alvarez de Pineda, a Spaniard, in 1519 sailed the gulf shore from Florida to the Mexican port of Tampico. He was followed by Cabeza de Vaca, David Ingram, and other explorers who are responsible for many pages of the history of the European exploration of the North American Continent.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill, which provides for the establishment of Padre Island as a national park, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 4) to provide for the establishment of the Padre Island National Park, in the State of Texas, introduced by Mr. YARBOROUGH, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That (a) the Secretary of the Interior shall acquire by gift, purchase, transfer from any Federal agency, or otherwise, such lands (together with any improvements thereon), as he shall consider necessary or desirable for the purpose of establishing a national park on Padre Island situated in the coastal waters of the State of Texas and extending from near Corpus Christi to near Brownsville, except that the Secretary of the Interior shall not exercise any authority under the provisions of this act unless and until the State of Texas by appropriate legislative action has consented to the establishment of such park.

(b) Any Federal agency is authorized to transfer, without consideration, to the Secretary of the Interior any lands (together with any improvements thereon) which are excess to the needs of such agency for use by the said Secretary in carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. (a) The lands acquired under the first section of this act shall be set aside as a public park for the benefit and enjoyment of the people of the United States, and shall be designated as the Padre Island National Park. The National Park Service, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall administer, protect, and develop the park, subject to the provisions of the act entitled "An act to establish a National Park Service, and for other purposes," approved August 25, 1916 (39 Stat. 535).

(b) In order to provide for the proper development and maintenance of the park, the Secretary of the Interior shall construct and maintain therein such roads, trails, markers, buildings, and other improvements, and such facilities for the care and accommodation of visitors, as he may deem necessary.

SEC. 3. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

FEDERAL AID TO SCHOOL CONSTRUCTION

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize an emergency 2-year program of Federal financial assistance in school construction to the States. The bill, which I introduce on behalf of myself, and my colleague, the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART], is no stranger to the Senate.

A bill similar to this one was the first bill introduced on the floor of the Senate in the 85th Congress. Last August, the provisions of the bill were offered as an amendment to the National Defense Education Act.

It was the first Federal aid to school construction measure to be voted on in this body in the past 8 years.

Although it failed to pass as an amendment, the size of the vote in favor of it was an encouraging omen of things to come.

The members of the Senate are as aware as I am of the hard facts of today's world. Unless we discover our best minds, and give them the education they must have, we are in for serious trouble.

We cannot hope to begin this education unless we have more and better school buildings. This is the heart of the problem.

The National Defense Education Act gave some relief to our colleges and universities. But it did not provide an iota of help to the basic units of our educational system, the compulsory school level.

We have witnessed a staggering increase in school enrollment in the years after World War II, and the population experts tell us that the worst, if we do not act swiftly, is yet to come.

This year more than 34.5 million youngsters attend our public schools, 3.9 percent more than last year, and a phenomenal 40.5 percent more than attended in 1949.

Mr. President, the contents of this bill are quite uncomplicated. It would provide a billion dollars a year for 2 years for school construction.

Each State would receive a grant based on the number of its school-age children, and each State would be required to match the Federal contribution.

It is estimated that enactment of this bill would effect the construction of almost 100,000 new classrooms over the 2-year period.

It would also permit the States to channel money into the improvement of teachers' salaries.

I want to make it clear that this bill is intentionally drafted to prevent any Federal interference in local school programs or policies.

I share the rightful distaste of the vast majority of my colleagues for Federal control over any phase of our traditionally local school system.

State after State has made a mighty effort to solve its own school problems. We are proud in Michigan about the progress we have made in the last decade.

Unfortunately, tax resources at the local level are strained. Further substantial increases will mean an almost intolerable load for an already overburdened property owner.

Enactment of this bill would mean that the more equitable tax base of the Federal Government would be used to meet this emergency.

This Senate has seldom been confronted by such an important problem for which the solutions were so readily apparent and so easy to provide.

If we are to secure the future of this country, this is the time for action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 8) to authorize an emergency 2-year program of Federal financial assistance in school construction to the States, introduced by Mr. McNAMARA (for himself and Mr. HART), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

AMENDMENT OF CLAYTON ACT WITH REFERENCE TO EQUALITY OF OPPORTUNITY

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and Senators CHAVEZ, HUMPHREY, GREEN, LANGER, MAGNUSON, McCARTHY, LONG, HILL, SPARKMAN, McNAMARA, CARROLL, NEUBERGER, MORSE, MURRAY, MOSS, WILEY, SMATHERS, JACKSON, McGEE, CHURCH, DOUGLAS, and O'MAHONEY, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Clayton Antitrust Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, with reference to equality of opportunity. The bill would make more effective the act's prohibitions against price discrimination by eliminating the defense of meeting in good faith the equally low price of a competitor in those instances where it is affirmatively shown that the price discrimination may substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly. Where the effect of the discrimination is not so severe as this, meeting competition in good faith would continue as a defense.

The necessity for the bill arises from the 1951 decision of the Supreme Court in the Standard Oil of Indiana case—340 U.S. 231. In this decision the Court held that price discriminations, unlawful under section 2(a) of the Clayton Act because of their substantial adverse effect upon competition, could be continued upon a showing that the discriminations were made in good faith.

This decision stands for the proposition that substantial lessening of competition or tendency toward monopoly is in the public interest if the business practices which produce these results are done in good faith.

The bill, on the other hand, is based on the proposition that substantial lessening of competition or tending toward monopoly is not in the public interest regardless of whether the business practices which produce those results are done in good faith or bad faith. The bill says that good faith monopoly is as repugnant to America as bad faith monopoly.

This is the third time I have introduced this bill in the Senate. A similar bill is being introduced also for the third time in the House by Representative WRIGHT PATMAN, of Texas, coauthor of the Robinson-Patman Act and a lifelong friend of small business. This proposed legislation has been numbered H.R. 11 in the House and S. 11 in the Senate in both the 84th and 85th Congresses and is known as the equality of opportunity bill.

Having failed of enactment in the two preceding Congresses, the bill is obviously highly controversial. In the 84th Congress, the bill passed the House by a vote of 393 to 3, but was never considered in the Senate having been caught in the closing days. In the 85th Congress, the bill was reported to the Senate by the Judiciary Committee with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, but again was caught in the closing days.

The bill which I have introduced is in the form in which it was reported in the last Congress by the Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee to the Judiciary Committee, and not as it was reported by the Judiciary Committee to the Senate after an amendment in the nature of a substitute. Although I voted to report the bill to the Senate as amended by the Judiciary Committee, I did so only to get the bill before the Senate where I hoped to restore the original language.

As I have stated, the bill is controversial. The issue involved is whether good faith monopoly shall continue to be permitted under the Standard Oil of Indiana case, or whether good faith monopoly as well as bad faith monopoly shall be condemned under the bill.

In order that all Senators who believe with me that good faith as well as bad faith monopoly must be prevented may have an opportunity to add their names as cosponsors, I ask unanimous consent that the bill lie on the desk for 1 week.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Tennessee.

The bill (S. 11) to amend the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act with reference to equality of opportunity, introduced by Mr. KEFAUVER (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FOREIGN SERVICE ACADEMY

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill for the establishment of a Foreign Service Academy.

As has so often been said, the ultimate future of the world, whether it is to be free or slave, will not be settled on battlefields, but rather in the minds of men.

Dedicated, well-trained representatives are at work for the Communist cause, all over the world.

We have not matched this effort; either in size or degree of training.

As a result of their unprecedented efforts to perform diplomatic services by means of these trained representatives, the Communists are steadily winning friends for their side.

And every convert to communism increases the threat to the free world; and to our own way of life.

We hear and read much of the struggle for the uncommitted nations of Asia, of Africa, and of Latin America.

If these areas are lost to communism, it will be increasingly clear that our survival is in jeopardy.

A recent much discussed book, "The Ugly American," reports in story form some of our failures in this field.

The failures in Foreign Service as recounted in this book did not come about because the Communists were 10-feet tall; or more intelligent, but because they were better trained.

Such mistakes by our representatives were not deliberate. Rather they resulted from a lack of background, especially with respect to the language, the history, and the customs of the country in question.

These are basic faults; and if we are to win this struggle they must be corrected.

The measure I introduce today is designed primarily to provide better training for the men and women who represent us abroad.

This Foreign Service Academy Act will establish a 4-year college for the training of our overseas representatives.

This Academy will be under the direction of the Secretary of State, with a board of trustees. I want to emphasize, however, that it is not designed to train people exclusively for State Department service.

The course of instruction will equip graduates to serve in foreign posts with all the branches of our Government which have overseas operations.

Students at this Academy would come from all parts of the country. They would be selected in the same manner as are appointees to the Service Academies.

Surely if we can afford three Service Academies for possible hot war, we can afford one Foreign Service Academy to handle the cold war which is now going on.

By means of the training proposed in this bill, first hundreds, later thousands of dedicated men and women who desire to serve their country effectively will have that opportunity.

I ask unanimous consent that this bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 15) to provide for the establishment of a U.S. Foreign Service Academy, introduced by Mr. SYMINGTON, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "United States Foreign Service Academy Act."

SEC. 2. The Secretary of State is authorized and directed to establish and maintain, in the middle western region of the United States, a United States Foreign Service Academy (hereinafter referred to as the "Academy") for the instruction and training of foreign representatives of the United States Government.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of State may appoint or assign such officers and civilian instructors as the needs of the Academy require.

SEC. 4. The supervision and charge of the Academy shall be in the Department of State, under such officer or officers as the Secretary of State may appoint for or assign to that duty, and under such regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe.

SEC. 5. In the operation of the Academy the Department of State shall work in conjunction with the Board of Trustees.

SEC. 6. (a) The Board of Trustees shall consist of

(1) The Secretary of State;

(2) Two educators of prominence appointed by the President;

(3) Two Members of the United States Senate, of different political parties, appointed by the President of the Senate; and

(4) Two Members of the House of Representatives of different political parties, appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

(b) Members of the Board of Trustees shall be appointed for 2-year terms and shall be eligible for reappointment.

SEC. 7. (a) The authorized number of students at the Academy shall be as follows:

(1) Four students from each State, two nominated by each Senator from the State;

(2) Two students from each congressional district, nominated by the Representative from the district;

(3) Two students from each Territory, nominated by the Delegate in Congress from the Territory;

(4) Two students from Puerto Rico, nominated by its Resident Commissioner;

(5) Three students from the District of Columbia, one nominated by each of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia;

(6) One hundred and twenty-seven students from the United States at large—

(A) One nominated by the Governor of each State;

(B) Seventy-five nominated by the President; and

(C) Three nominated by the Vice President.

(b) No person may be nominated under clauses (1) to (6), inclusive, of subsection (a), unless he is domiciled in the State or Territory, or in the congressional district from which he is nominated, or in the District of Columbia or Puerto Rico, if nominated from one of those places.

(c) If as a result of redistricting a State the domicile of a student, or a nominee, nominated by a Representative falls within a congressional district other than that from which he was nominated, he shall be charged to the district in which his domicile so falls. For this purpose, the number of students otherwise authorized for that district shall be increased to include him. However, the number as so increased shall be reduced by one if he fails to become a student at the Academy or when he is finally separated from the Academy.

SEC. 8. In order to permit an orderly increase in the number of students at the Academy during the period ending not more than 4 years after the entrance of the initial class at the Academy, the board of trustees may limit the number of students appointed each year during such period.

SEC. 9. The Academy shall operate as a coeducational institution and students shall be appointed thereto on the basis of merit, as determined by a competitive examination to be given annually in each State and Territory, the District of Columbia, and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, at such time, in such manner, and covering such subject matter as the Secretary of State may prescribe. Students shall be appointed in the order of their merit as established by such examination.

SEC. 10. The students of the U.S. Foreign Service Academy shall receive the same pay and allowances as are received by cadets at West Point.

SEC. 11. The course of instruction and training for students at the Academy shall be prescribed by the Secretary of State, and shall be the equivalent of the curriculum prescribed by accredited colleges and universities as a prerequisite to the granting of the degree of bachelor of arts. In prescribing such course of instruction and training, the Secretary of State shall provide that special emphasis be placed on the study of the history, culture, customs, folklore, and language or languages of the nations in which cadets may serve and provide for field studies in such nations. The Academy may arrange to assign temporarily selected students to the Air, Military, and Naval Academies of the United States for instruction in military observation. Upon satisfactory completion of the prescribed course of instruction and training, students shall be granted the degree of bachelor of arts.

SEC. 12. Each student selected for admission to the Academy shall sign an agreement that, unless sooner separated, he will—

(1) Complete the course of instruction at the Academy; and

(2) Accept an appointment and service, as an officer or employee of the United States in any position for which he is qualified by reason of his special training at the Academy, for at least the 3 years immediately following the granting of his degree from the Academy.

SEC. 13. (a) The course of study at the Academy shall, during each year of its operation, be organized as follows:

(1) The months of September to May, inclusive, shall be devoted to classroom instruction of students at the Academy;

(2) The period from June 1 to June 30, inclusive, shall be devoted to annual leave for all students;

(3) The months of July and August shall be devoted to practical field training for students at the Academy.

(b) Such field training shall consist of assigning students for service positions under appropriate departments of the government, whether within or outside the United States, by a faculty board on field training, with the approval of the Secretary of State.

SEC. 14. (a) Each graduate of the Academy shall be available for appointment as an officer or employee of the United States, in any position for which he is qualified by reason of his special training at the Academy, in accordance with the following priorities:

(1) The Department of State;

(2) The Department of Commerce;

(3) The Department of Agriculture;

(4) The Department of the Treasury;

(5) The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare; and

(6) Any other department, agency, or instrumentality of the United States.

(b) The Secretary of State may, notwithstanding any provision of the Foreign Service Act of 1946, appoint a graduate of the Academy as an officer in the Foreign Service of the United States.

SEC. 15. (a) There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

(b) The U.S. Foreign Service Academy shall have power to acquire and hold real and personal property and may receive and accept gifts, donations, and trusts.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SYMINGTON. I am glad to yield to my friend from Tennessee.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I congratulate the Senator from Missouri upon the introduction of this measure. I think it is one of the most important proposals for peace and for our proper representation abroad which will be before Congress. I certainly hope the bill will be passed at an early date.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I thank the distinguished Senator from Tennessee for his kind statement.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SYMINGTON. I yield.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I commend the distinguished Senator from Missouri upon the introduction of his bill. It was my privilege in the past session to be a cosponsor of a similar bill introduced by the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD]. I think the Senator from Missouri by introducing the bill this early in the session and urging its immediate consideration has shown leadership in this important matter.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I thank the Senator from Texas for his remarks. I have discussed this matter with the distinguished junior Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD]. There is a difference between the bill which I have introduced and the bill which the Senator from Montana introduced in the last session, and which was cosponsored by the Senator from Texas. Their bill provided for graduate study. I believe it is important that we have an undergraduate academy for the training of foreign service personnel comparable to our military academies.

CONSTRUCTION OF SAN LUIS UNIT, CENTRAL VALLEY PROJECT, CALIF.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, the great and constantly growing State of California continues to grapple with tremendous problems which have a decided national as well as local interest. Foremost among these is our seemingly perpetual question of making most effective use of natural resources and the pressing matter of meeting an ever-mounting demand for water.

On behalf of my colleague, the junior Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], and myself, I am introducing a new version of a bill which has been before the Congress for approximately 4 years, a bill to authorize construction of the San Luis project on the west side of the San Joaquin Valley.

This bill is a refinement of the legislation which last year was favorably reported by our Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, after two sets of hearings and considerable negotiation between Federal and State authorities, and which shortly before final adjournment was passed by the Senate.

From time to time during my service in this body, I have had occasion, Mr. President, to discuss the importance of Federal assistance to California in the fields of flood control and water conservation. In view of the fact that we now have a substantial number of new colleagues, I feel it is incumbent upon me to mention the reason why this particular San Luis bill is regarded as deserving of very high priority by my distinguished colleague and myself.

In introducing this measure, I wish to point out to the Senate that I have the privilege of joining in presenting legislation on water matters with an experienced attorney and legislator who long has been concerned with natural resources. The Senate will have the benefit of the knowledge gained by my colleague during his years of service in the other body where he ultimately became chairman of the important Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

It has been my own policy never to propose a water project in California for Federal construction until the responsible officials of my State have formally recommended Federal participation in efforts to assure the maximum utilization and conservation of our precious water resources. This is particularly true in the case of the measure I am introducing today.

The San Luis bill, which would authorize an integrated project to be jointly financed and operated by the Bureau of Reclamation and the State of California, has been drafted in consultation with both Federal and State agencies. It is definitely in response to the desires of the State department of water resources and will mean a working partnership to supply a variety of needs.

California has unique water problems. For a large part of our State, the vagaries of nature subject our people to literal feast-or-famine cycles. In the current rainy season now well advanced, most of California is becoming uneasy about the smallest amount of precipitation in decades, even in generations. Yet many of my distinguished colleagues will recall that only 3 years ago, at the opening of the 2d session of the 84th Congress, I was taking an active part in proposing emergency measures for flood relief because of the devastation suffered over extensive sections of central and northern California from unseasonable storms.

The San Luis project would be another vital step toward more efficient and more orderly utilization of water. It would supply water for nearly 500,000 acres of agricultural land in an area where farming necessarily has been reduced and curtailed because of lowering water tables. It would provide storage and regulating facilities for a gigantic interbasin exchange by which the State of California intends to move surplus Feather River water from northern California to the water-hungry and thickly settled Los Angeles-San Diego area.

The State of California is embarked on a plan of self-help in this field. However, it definitely needs the cooperation and assistance of the Federal Government. This bill will provide for the maximum efficiency and greatest return on a substantial investment by allowing the Federal and the State agencies to join hands in building a feasible and an urgent project.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 44) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct the San Luis unit of the Central Valley project, California, to enter into an agreement with the State of California with respect to the construction and operation of such unit, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. KUCHEL (for himself and Mr. ENGLE), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

EXCLUSION OF CERTAIN WAGES FROM WITHHOLDING TAX

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide that wages paid by States and political subdivisions to individuals employed on relief projects shall not be subject to the withholding tax.

There is clear justification and important need for this improvement in our Federal tax policies as they concern payments by welfare departments to persons employed on work relief projects.

The maximum amount which can be paid on a work relief project is limited to the amount determined by welfare agencies as necessary to meet the minimum needs of the beneficiary and his dependents for food, clothing, shelter, and personal needs.

Obviously, if Federal income taxes are withheld from payments determined at the level of minimum needs, the take-home pay remaining will not be sufficient to meet those needs. Therefore, it becomes necessary for the local government to increase the size of the payment sufficiently to cover the income tax withheld. In effect, the local government is required to pay the individual income tax in addition to providing support for the dependent person and his family.

Under the existing situation, local governments which provide work relief instead of direct relief payments are penalized.

This problem is a particularly serious one for Milwaukee County. County officials estimate that passage of this bill would result in savings to the county of more than $35,000 per year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 45) to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide that wages paid by States and political subdivisions to individuals employed on relief projects shall not be subject to the withholding tax, introduced by Mr. PROXMIRE, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

STATEHOOD FOR HAWAII

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I send to the desk for appropriate reference a bill to admit the populous and prosperous American Territory of Hawaii into the Union as a State of the United States. Appropriately, I have requested that the symbolic number S. 50 be assigned to this measure.

Joining me as sponsors of this historic legislation are more than 50 distinguished Senators from both sides of the aisle and from all sections of the United States. This number of cosponsors, plus those other Senators who have assured me that, although for one reason or another they did not wish to cosponsor the bill, they nevertheless would support the measure and vote for it, means that a clear and undisputed majority of the Members of the Senate of the 86th Congress believe that Hawaii should have statehood this session of this Congress. This conviction is also, I am certain, that of the great majority of the American people.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the names of the distinguished Senators who are cosponsors to the Hawaii statehood bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the names were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. ALLOTT, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. BARTLETT, Mr. BEALL, Mr. BENNETT, Mr. BIBLE, Mr. CANNON, Mr. CARROLL, Mr. CASE of South Dakota, Mr. CASE of New Jersey, Mr. CHAVEZ, Mr. CHURCH, Mr. CLARK, Mr. COOPER, Mr. DIRKSEN, Mr. DOUGLAS, Mr. ENGLE, Mr. FREAR, Mr. GOLDWATER, Mr. GREEN, Mr. GRUENING, Mr. HART, Mr. HARTKE, Mr. HENNINGS, Mr. HOLLAND, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. JAVITS, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. KUCHEL, Mr. LONG, Mr. MCCARTHY, Mr. MCGEE, Mr. MCNAMARA, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. MANSFIELD, Mr. MORSE, Mr. MORTON, Mr. MOSS, Mr. MUSKIE, Mr. NEUBERGER, Mr. O'MAHONEY, Mr. PASTORE, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. SALTONSTALL, Mr. SCOTT, Mrs. SMITH, Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey, Mr. YARBOROUGH, Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, it is significant that this list of sponsors includes so many able Senators from both parties and from all parts of the country. This year, as in past years, Hawaii statehood is bipartisan and a nonpartisan cause. It has had, and has now, the support of President Eisenhower, as it had that of Presidents Truman and Roosevelt.

Mr. President, proposed legislation on statehood for Hawaii has been before the Congress of the United States, off and on, for four decades, beginning with H.R. 15865 in 1919, in the 65th Congress. Hearings and investigations of the issue by Congress began in 1935.

EIGHTEEN CONGRESSIONAL HEARINGS HELD

Since that time no less than 18 full-scale hearings and investigations have been conducted by committees of Congress on the issue of statehood for Hawaii, both in the Territory itself and here in the National Capital. Few, indeed, are the issues that come before us that have been as thoroughly and as well explored and considered as has statehood for Hawaii.

The measure the majority of Senators, including myself, are sponsoring today is identical with S. 50, as reported by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs in the 85th Congress. That bill, in turn, was similar in its substantive provisions to the Hawaii statehood bill in the 84th Congress, which was based on the statehood bill that was debated for a full month in this body in 1954, and was finally approved by a substantial majority.

I cite this long and impressive legislative history, Mr. President, only to emphasize that the facts and issues concerning statehood for Hawaii already are well known. A most complete record is before this body.

OPPONENTS TO HAVE OPPORTUNITY TO BE HEARD

I cannot believe that any public purpose would be served by long and protracted public hearings again this year. However, I do urge that hearings be held, but that they be limited, as far as possible, to any new evidence that may be pertinent and to the reception of the views of those in opposition to Hawaiian statehood. It is most important that the hearings be held at an early date in this 1st session of the 86th Congress.

Mr. President, I have been a student of statehood for Hawaii for many years, and recently I made a personal inspection trip to the Territory, on behalf of the committee. I visited all of the islands of the Territory, and talked with persons in all walks of life and of various political persuasions.

From my long study and my personal findings, I am convinced that the 600,000 American citizens of Hawaii meet each and every one of our historic tests of readiness for statehood and fitness for it. The overwhelming majority of the people want statehood, and are ready, willing and able to support it.

STATEHOOD IN BEST INTERESTS OF NATION

I am equally convinced that statehood for Hawaii would be in the best interests of the Nation as a whole, as well as in the best interests of the more than a half million Americans of Hawaii. The Territory is blessed with great riches of soil, climate, and people. It has the highest productivity in the entire world for sugar and pineapples. Its climate, scenic beauty, accessibility, and facilities make it one of the foremost recreation spots of the world. Its people are industrious, well-educated in one of the top-ranking school systems under the American flag, and imbued with an unflagging zeal and patriotism for America, as shown by their record on the battlefields of Europe and Korea.

The admission of Hawaii would also constitute a singular achievement in diplomacy. What could be a better argument than this to the critical Far Eastern area that the United States is still the land of promise for people of all backgrounds? The Hawaiian Americans of Japanese and other oriental backgrounds will be the living example that we live by principles of freedom and self-determination for all people. These thoroughly American people of oriental background can be a catalyst of untold value in accomplishing understanding where understanding is most needed.

Mr. President, Hawaii is the sole remaining incorporated Territory under the American flag. It is the only remaining area that has met our historic tests for statehood.

Hawaii, with its long period of tutelage for statehood as an incorporated Territory, with its large, thoroughly American population, its economic development, the splendid war record of its people in fighting and dying for American ideals in both Europe and Asia, and the desire of its people for statehood, fits perfectly into the historic pattern under which our Nation has grown great.

I most earnestly urge that we follow this path of greatness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 50) to provide for the admission of the State of Hawaii into the Union, introduced by Mr. MURRAY (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

AMENDMENT OF ACT OF AUGUST 5, 1954, RELATING TO INDIAN HEALTH

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senators from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN and Mr. GOLDWATER], the Senators from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE and Mr. CANNON], the Senators from Oregon [Mr. MORSE and Mr. NEUBERGER], the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH], the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. MOSS], the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] and myself, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the act of August 5, 1954, which transferred responsibility for Indian health from the Department of the Interior to the Public Health Service.

The purpose of the bill is to authorize the Public Health Service to provide basic sanitation facilities on Indian reservations. The bill we introduce today is identical to S. 3694, as approved unanimously during the 2d session of the 85th Congress by the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, the Senate, and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. A single objection in the other House during the closing hours of the 85th Congress prevented its passage.

The administration favors this bill, and so reported to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare last year. The Indians favor this bill, as evidenced by the editorial from the December 1, 1958, "NCAI Bulletin" published by the National Congress of American Indians, which will appear following these remarks.

The need for improved Indian sanitation facilities is great and urgent, as indicated by an article entitled, "Indian Health, 1958," appearing in the fall, 1958, issue of "Calumet," published by the Marquette League. The author of the article is Forrest J. Gerard, tribal relations officer of the Indian Health Division of the Public Health Service. Mr. Gerard, I am proud to add, is a member of the great Blackfeet Tribe of Montana, where last year a tragic outbreak of polio resulted from inadequate sanitation facilities.

Mr. Gerard's article will appear following these remarks, but I want to call particular attention to some of the grim statistics he cites, as follows:

Twenty-two percent of all Indian deaths occur before the first year of life, compared to only 7 percent for corresponding age groups in the general population. Moreover, nearly a third of all Indian deaths are accounted for before the fifth year of life, compared to 8 percent in the population as a whole. This high infant mortality rate is largely responsible for the early average age at the time of death for Indians—39 years compared to the national figure of 61 years.

Mr. Gerard reports that a recent Public Health Service survey covering environmental sanitation conditions on a large Southwest Indian reservation revealed the following:

Forty-five percent of the Indians have no facilities for excreta disposal, other than the grounds around the dwellings.

Sixty-two percent of the houses have no screening.

Twenty-five percent live in "wickiups", which are constructed of saplings, yucca fronds, or other wild long-leaved plants.

Eighty-eight percent use unsafe, contaminated water supplies.

Great strides have been made in Indian health during the past few years, under the Public Health Administration. Yet, as Mr. Gerard has pointed out, "it is a hard fact that more than half of the deaths and most of the illnesses among the Indians are caused by diseases and conditions that can be prevented or controlled."

My distinguished and most able colleague from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], who obtained speedy Senate approval of S. 3694 last year, is particularly aware of the need for this legislation. Only last month the Montana State Board of Health reported that on the Fort Belknap and Rocky Boy Reservations, in Montana, only about 5 percent of the Indians have a safe water supply within one-quarter of a mile from their homes, and less than 10 percent have safe water storage and proper garbage disposal.

"Treasure State Health," published by the State board of health, concluded that "the passage of the sanitary facilities bill by Congress is of utmost importance to help improve this horrible condition."

It is my hope that this bill will become one of the first public laws of the 86th Congress.

Mr. President, it may be that additional Senators who have not had an opportunity to study this problem during these busy opening days of the new session may wish to cosponsor this bill. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the bill lie on the table until Tuesday, January 13.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that the editorial entitled "These Children Must Live," from the December 1, 1958, issue of the "NCAI Bulletin," and the article "Indian Health, 1958," from the fall, 1958, issue of "Calumet," be printed in the RECORD immediately following these remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INDIAN HEALTH—1958

(By Forrest J. Gerard)

Historically, responsibility for Indian health dates from the time the Indians were located on reservations by the Federal Government, and were under the jurisdiction of the War Department. Thus the first contact that the Indian had with the white man's medicine was through the Army medical officers on their reservations. In 1849, the Department of the Interior was made responsible for Indian affairs, and a more comprehensive program for medical care began to evolve.

Only July 1, 1955, this responsibility was transferred from the Department of the Interior's Bureau of Indian Affairs to the U.S. Public Health Service. In assuming its new role as family doctor, community hospital, and local health department for some 380,000 Indians and Alaska natives, the Public Health Service accepted a mandate from Congress to raise the level of health among these peoples to one which will compare favorably with that of the population as a whole.

Significant progress has been made by the Public Health Service's Division of Indian Health since the transfer in 1955. Facts and figures relating to this progress become more meaningful when considered against the background of serious Indian health problems. In many respects health conditions among the Indians today are similar to those which prevailed generally in this country a half century ago. Despite recent progress in health and medicine, our Indian citizens bear undue burdens of preventable illness and early loss of life. Such a conclusion is backed by hard facts.

Infant mortality is excessively high in the Indian population of the United States; 22 percent of all Indian deaths occur before the first year of life, compared to only 7 percent for corresponding age groups in the general population. Moreover, nearly a third of all Indian deaths are accounted for before the fifth year of life, compared to 8 percent in the population as a whole. This high infant mortality rate is largely responsible for the early average age at the time of death for Indians—39 years compared to the national figure of 61 years.

Communicable diseases, which for the most part have been brought under control in the general population by known and proven public health measures, continue to cause a disproportionate amount of illness and resultant deaths among Indians in the continental United States. The Indian death rate from tuberculosis is 4 times that of our general population. The death rate from gastroenteric diseases is 6 times greater, and from influenza and pneumonia it is 4 times greater than corresponding death rates for the rest of the country.

Adverse environmental conditions play an important role in the substandard health status of Indians. A recent Public Health Service survey covering environmental sanitation conditions on a large Southwest Indian reservation reveals the following grim picture:

Housing: 71 percent live in frame houses; 25 percent live in "wickiups" (constructed of saplings, yucca fronds or other wild long-leaved plants); 76 percent live in 1- or 2-room houses as compared with 20 percent for the entire State; 42 percent live in houses with 3 or more persons per room. A mere 20 percent of the houses have electricity.

Wastes: 45 percent have no facilities for excreta disposal other than the grounds around the dwellings; 28 percent have privies of faulty construction; 23 percent have satisfactory privies; 4 percent have inside toilets.

Premise sanitation: 7 percent of houses have refrigeration; 12 percent of houses have full screening; 26 percent of houses have partial screening; 62 percent of houses have no screening.

Water supply: 12 percent use approved sources which are safe; 88 percent use unsafe, contaminated supplies; 5 percent of houses have water piped inside; 95 percent must haul water distances up to 3 miles.

Water must be hauled by hand, donkey, or burro, and by car.

Sources include wells, infiltration galleries, irrigation ditches, rivers, and springs.

Conditions similar to these are to be found on practically every Indian reservation now being served by the Public Health Service. Such environmental conditions have a direct relationship to the high incidence of tuberculosis, gastroenteric diseases, influenza and pneumonia, and other communicable diseases that are prevalent on the Indian reservation.

Progress in the improvement of Indian health reflects advancements made in both the prevention and treatment of important disease categories. Tuberculosis, which for many years was the leading cause of death among Indians, now ranks seventh as a death cause. Between 1954 and 1956, the death rate from this disease dropped 25 percent among Indians outside Alaska. Among Alaska natives, the rate dropped 57 percent during the same period. New cases of tuberculosis reported among Indians outside Alaska have dropped 25 percent since 1954—from 570 cases per 100,000 population in 1954 to 425 in 1957.

At the time of the transfer in July 1955, hundreds of Indians with active tuberculosis could not receive needed hospital treatment due to a lack of beds. To remedy this situation the Public Health Service launched a "crash program" obtaining on a contract basis sorely needed hospital beds and the services of medical specialists required for the treatment of tuberculosis. So successful was this effort that all known tuberculosis patients who are beneficiaries of the Indian health program in need of hospital care and willing to accept it are receiving such treatment.

In the isolated, scattered, and remote Alaska villages, our tuberculosis casefinding activities and chemotherapy service have been intensified and expanded. As a result only 1 out of every 50 Alaska natives now is under hospital treatment for this disease, compared with 1 out of 30 2½ years ago. There are no Alaska patients on waiting lists.

Important progress is being made in the task of reducing premature death among the Indian population. From 1954 to 1957, the Indian infant death rate has dropped from 65.5 deaths in each 1,000 babies born alive, to 54.6 percent. The effectiveness of the team approach, comprising the physician, nurse, health education worker, and sanitation specialist is beginning to be reflected by the decline in infant mortality. The Indian people themselves are recognizing the necessity of making greater use of medical services as a means of improving their health status. Hospital admissions in Public Health Service hospitals (55) and contract facilities (about 160) were 32 percent higher in 1957 than in 1955. The 7,300 births reported in hospitals operated directly for Indians represent an increase of 10 percent over 1955. Services provided by hospital staffs at outpatient clinics increased 33 percent over 1955.

The major challenge in Indian health continues to be the prevention of disease. Much of the effort for prevention is carried on in the larger Indian health centers and smaller health facilities, located in close proximity to the localities where Indians live. Since the transfer of the Indian health program to the Public Health Service, field health services have been extended on a regularly scheduled basis to 70 health stations and their satellite locations in the United States where no services, or only emergency services, were provided in the past. All together (in the United States exclusive of Alaska), a total of 19 health centers, 175 health stations, and 50 satellite locations now are providing one or more types of health service, such as dentistry, public health nursing, sanitation, and health education. In Alaska, 75 villages are being provided with health services.

The 19 Indian health centers which have full-time physicians' services provide therapeutic and preventive care on an outpatient basis. Services through these facilities increased 29 percent between 1955 and 1957. Visits to dental clinics increased 34 percent in the same period. At the 16 school health centers, most of which are off-reservation boarding schools operated by the Bureau of Indian Affairs outside Alaska, visits to doctors and nurses increased by 13 percent, and completed immunizations doubled in the 1 year 1956–57.

Personnel in the Indian health program have been materially increased during the past 3 years. The number of physicians has been nearly doubled; 230 are now on duty. Pharmacists have increased from 7 to 32. The sanitation staff has been more than doubled, and now is serving 60 percent of the beneficiary population. Dentists have been increased to a total of 77, almost twice the number on duty in 1955. Indian workers are being trained to assist in two important phases of the program. As community workers in health education, and as sanitarian aids in the activities conducted on reservations, they are bringing the knowledge of better health practices directly to the Indian beneficiaries in a manner that is understandable and acceptable.

While progress in Indian health is encouraging, it is a hard fact that more than half of the deaths and most of the illnesses among the Indians are caused by diseases and conditions that can be prevented or controlled. The Public Health Service is making a good beginning; much more remains to be done.

[From the National Congress of American Indians Bulletin, Dec. 1, 1958]

THESE CHILDREN MUST LIVE

Hundreds of Indian children die each year from preventable diseases. Hundreds more are crippled, or have shortened life expectancies.

According to the U.S. Public Health Service, more than a fourth of the Indian babies born in the Dakotas and Nebraska die before they are a year old. Most of the infant deaths occur during the first month, shortly after many of the babies are taken from the safety of a hospital nursery to cold, often unsanitary homes.

Though the chief causes of this alarming death rate are listed as diarrhea and dysentery, the real killer is poverty. Indian tribes are too poor to provide adequate water supplies and sanitation facilities to the people on their underdeveloped reservations. The average Indian family—still earning less than $1,000 annually—is too poor to build and maintain the kind of home in which healthy children can grow.

Public Health officials admit that with appropriations for Indian health services at the present $40 million level it will take a century to bring sanitation on the reservations up to minimum standards. Until these standards—adequate supplies of safe water and sanitary preparation of food and disposal of waste—are met, Indian children will continue to face early death or illness.

This is why the Public Health Service asked the last Congress to pass legislation which would permit it to help Indian tribes and families improve sanitation on the Nation's reservations.

Despite strong support from the National Congress of American Indians and other organizations, the so-called sanitation bill was blocked after Senate passage by one Congressman's objection.

We are confident that bills providing basic assistance to tribes and individuals in the improvement of reservation sanitation will be introduced early in the coming session of Congress.

NCAI is pledged to support such legislation and to work for increased appropriations for operation of Public Health Service activities in the Indian field. We are sure that these drives will receive overwhelming support from all Indians and those concerned with their welfare.

Our Indian children must be given a chance to live.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 56) to amend the act of August 5, 1954 (68 Stat. 674), and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MURRAY (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

HOUSING ACT OF 1959

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and Senators FULBRIGHT, YARBOROUGH, RANDOLPH, BYRD of West Virgina, MONRONEY, and MORSE, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to rejuvenate the Nation's housing programs and ask for its appropriate referral. Under the parliamentary procedures of many assemblies, this bill would be considered under the heading of unfinished business. I think we may consider this bill as unfinished business of the 85th Congress.

With certain exceptions, which are obviously necessary and which I shall explain, this bill is identical with the omnibus housing bill, S. 4035, that passed the Senate by voice vote on July 11, 1958. It was amended in several respects by the House Committee on Banking and Currency; and, in its amended form, it received 251 votes for passage and only 134 votes against passage.

S. 4035 failed to pass the House because it was maneuvered into a parliamentary situation enabling an opposition vote of one-third to defeat the bill. Repeated efforts to compromise controversial features of the bill were rebuffed by the administration, and the 85th Congress closed without overcoming an adamant executive branch.

Subsequently, the Nation overwhelmingly expressed its confidence in the democratic leadership of the Congress. I believe that housing legislation was one issue which contributed to this confidence. In this belief, I hope that this unfinished business—housing legislation—will be quickly enacted and forwarded to the President for signature.

Many of the provisions of this bill relate to programs which have suffered critically in the intervening months. Some of the more urgent matters are the FHA insurance authorization, the funds for urban renewal, contracting authority for public housing, the revolving fund for college housing loans, and authority to erase the backlog in applications for home loans to veterans.

In the interest of expediting Senate action, I have tried to retain the bill exactly as it passed the Senate last year, except where the passage of time or new evidence of need make changes absolutely necessary. I have made only nine changes in the bill, and I will explain briefly each change.

First, FHA mortgage insurance authorization: As passed by the Senate, S. 4035 increased this authorization in the amount of $4 billion a year for each of 4 years, beginning July 1, 1959. Since adjournment of the 85th Congress, insurance authorization available to the FHA has been, for all practical purposes, exhausted. It is necessary, therefore, to provide additional authorization to enable the agency to operate for the remainder of the current fiscal year. Consequently, this bill would authorize $4 billion for the current fiscal year, and an additional $4 billion to become available on July 1, 1959.

This bill does not attempt to supply FHA authorization beyond the year beginning July 1, 1959, because experience has shown that estimates of the agency's needs are subject to great error. During consideration of this bill in committee, the Senate can obtain the views of the agency and will have an opportunity to consider the adequacy of this proposed increase.

Second. Funds for urban renewal: As passed by the Senate last year, S. 4035 authorized a 6-year urban renewal program, with an annual capital grant authorization of $300 million, which amount could be increased by $150 million in any 1 year. Since that time, complete figures have become available regarding the activity under this program for the fiscal year 1958. These figures show that during fiscal year 1958 the gross amount of applications received totaled $680 million, and after processing adjustments and other types of attrition the net demand for funds totaled $447 million. Only $300 million was available to meet this demand during 1958. Thus, a need of approximately $150 million was not served for lack of funds.

There is every reason to suppose that the momentum of this program will not diminish and that the net demand for fiscal year 1959 will equal or exceed the $447 million experience in 1958. There is likewise no reason to suppose that essential slum clearance and urban renewal activities throughout the Nation can be achieved at a lower level of Federal participation in future years. Consequently, in the face of this convincing evidence of need, this bill proposes a 6-year urban renewal program with an annual capital grant authorization of $350 million which may be increased by $150 million in any 1 year; and the amount provided for fiscal 1959 would become available upon enactment.

Third. Urban planning grants: The Housing Act of 1954 established a program of grants to facilitate urban planning for smaller communities which lack adequate planning resources; $5 million dollars was authorized for this purpose in 1954, and an additional $5 million was authorized in 1956. Of this $10 million authorization, less than $1 million remains to be appropriated, and a backlog of over $3 million in applications is now on hand in the housing agency.

This is a matter which has become critical since adjournment of the 85th Congress and this bill would increase the authorization for urban planning grants for small communities by $10 million.

Fourth. Low-rent public housing: As passed last year, S. 4035 extended for 1 year the unused portion of the 35,000-unit authorization which expired on July 1, 1958, and extended for 1 year the 35,000-unit authorization which will expire on July 1, 1959. In addition, S. 4035 authorized 17,500 units to become available on July 1, 1959, and to remain available until July 1, 1962. Since the bill I introduce is designed to cover the period through fiscal year 1960, the dates have been advanced 1 year. Under this bill, the 35,000 units initially made available in 1956 are extended until July 1, 1960, the 35,000 units which became available on July 1, 1957, are extended to July 1, 1961, and the 17,500 new units will remain available until July 1, 1963.

Fifth. Par purchase under FNMA special assistance functions: S. 4035 extended the par purchase requirement for activity of the Federal National Mortgage Associations under its special assistance functions until August 8, 1959. Since this bill is designed to operate through the present session of Congress, the bill moves this termination date forward 1 year and extends the par purchase provision until August 8, 1960.

Sixth. Direct loans for veterans: Last year's bill expressed recognition by the Senate that the direct home loan program administered by the Veterans' Administration could not function under the burden of the huge backlog existing last summer. As of last May, this backlog consisted of approximately 35,000 veterans on the waiting list, and the Senate authorized an additional $150 million to help bring the program to a current status. At the present time, this backlog contains over 50,000 veterans on the waiting list, and the $150 million contained in last year's bill is hopelessly inadequate. Consequently, based upon these changed circumstances, this bill proposes that $300 million be made available immediately for direct home loans to eligible veterans. These loans can be made only in areas where credit is not otherwise available.

Seventh. Voluntary Home Mortgage Credit Program: Under existing law, this program, designed to assist veterans in obtaining home loans without using the direct loan facilities of the Veterans' Administration, will expire on July 31, 1959. This program has been a great help to veterans and has operated at nominal expense to the Federal Government. Since its expiration was not imminent at the time of passage of S. 4035, an extension of the program was not included. The bill I introduce, therefore, extends the Voluntary Home Mortgage Credit Program until July 1, 1960, and insures its continued operation through the present session of Congress.

Eighth. Special provisions for the State of Alaska: Certain provisions of existing law refer to the State of Alaska as a Territory and recognize special construction cost conditions in that State. Alaska has been admitted to the Union since adjournment of the 85th Congress and it is necessary to recognize the change in status while retaining the provisions of law formerly applicable to the Territory.

Ninth. Military housing: One provision in last year's bill was designed to expedite acquisition by the Federal Government of so-called Wherry housing projects at or near military installations. Subsequent to the passage of S. 4035, the Congress passed other legislation on this subject. Since there has not been time to evaluate the effectiveness of the amended law, I have deleted this provision from this bill.

Mr. President, the introduction of this bill should not be construed to represent my personal views regarding the best or ultimate solutions to any of the housing problems which the programs concerned have been designed to solve. As many of my colleagues know, I supported many features of last year's bill which the Senate wisely, or unwisely, chose to modify or eliminate.

In an effort to obtain early passage of a housing bill, I am not quarreling with the wisdom of the Senate and I am not raising new controversies. The Senate knows that I respect the necessity for moderation and for honorable compromise between those of opposing views. But in my opinion this bill has already been compromised. It was compromised in committee and it was compromised on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. President, I believe this is a good bill. I hope it may receive early attention and approval. I will urge that the committee and the Senate approve a housing bill as quickly as possible.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at this point in my remarks there be inserted a section-by-section summary of the provisions of the bill which I introduce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the section-by-section summary will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 57) to extend and amend laws relating to the provision and improvement of housing and the renewal of urban communities, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. SPARKMAN (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The section-by-section summary presented by Mr. SPARKMAN is as follows:

DIGEST OF BILL

TITLE I—FHA INSURANCE PROGRAMS

Property improvement loans

SEC. 101. Amends section 2(a) of the National Housing Act to extend the title I property improvement program of the FHA 1 year until September 30, 1960.

Technical

SEC. 102. Makes cross-references between FHA section 204 (payment of insurance) and the six insurance programs to which this provision applies.

Mortgage ceilings for sales housing

SEC. 103. (a) Amends section 203 (b) (2) of the National Housing Act (regular sales housing program) to increase the maximum mortgage amount which may be insured by FHA on sales housing, as follows: From $20,000 to $22,500 on 1-family homes; from $20,000 to $25,000 on 2-family homes; and from $27,500 to $30,000 on 3-family homes. The existing ceiling of $35,000 on 4-family homes would not be changed.

(b) Amends section 203(b)(8) of the National Housing Act (regular sales housing program) to increase the nonoccupant owner's maximum loan to the maximum permitted the homeowner—the nonoccupant owner would put into escrow 15 percent of the mortgage amount for 18 months or until he sells the property. (A nonoccupant owner is now permitted 85 percent of the mortgage amount available to a homeowner.)

(c) Amends section 203(i) of the National Housing Act (housing in rural and outlying areas) to permit an increase from $8,000 to $9,000 in the maximum insurable loan.

Regular rental housing program

SEC. 104. Amends section 207 of the National Housing Act to delete all provisions relating to housing for elderly persons, since the proposed bill (in title II) establishes a new FHA section 229 program of mortgage insurance for elderly persons' housing.

The present dollar limitations on the maximum amount of a section 207 mortgage would be increased, as follows:

	Present		Proposed
	Per room	Per unit if under 4 rooms	Per room	Per unit if under 4 rooms
Garden type	$2,250	$8,100	$2,500	$9,000
Elevator type	2,700	8,400	3,000	9,400
Increase for high-cost areas	1,000	---	1,250	---

Amends section 207(c)(3) to increase the mortgage limits for trailer courts or parks from $1,000 to $1,500 per space, and from $300,000 to $500,000 per mortgage.

Cooperative housing

SEC. 105. (a) Amends section 213(b)(2) of the National Housing Act to—

(1) Increase the maximum loan ratio from 90 percent of replacement cost (95 percent of replacement cost if 50 percent of the cooperators are veterans) to 97 percent of replacement cost; and

(2) Increase the present dollar limitations on the maximum loan amount to the same amounts allowed for section 207.

(b) Amends section 213(d) to permit the inclusion of community (but not commercial) facilities in mortgages on property held by sales-type and investor-sponsored cooperatives.

Mortgage ceilings for Alaska, Guam, and Hawaii

SEC. 106. Amends section 214 of the National Housing Act to provide that the 50-percent higher mortgage amount which the FHA Commissioner, at his discretion, may allow in Alaska, Guam, and Hawaii, may be applied to high-cost-area mortgage amounts in the programs where such high-cost area provisions pertain.

General mortgage insurance authorization

SEC. 107. Amends section 217 of the National Housing Act to increase FHA's general mortgage insurance authorization by $4 billion for each of the fiscal years 1959 and 1960.

Repeal of obsolete provision

SEC. 108. Repeals section 218 of the National Housing Act, an obsolete provision, which permitted the transfer of application fees from the FHA section 608 program to the section 207, regular rental housing program.

Housing in urban renewal areas

SEC. 109. (a) Amends section 220(d)(3)(A) of the National Housing Act (urban renewal housing) to increase the maximum mortgage amount which may be insured by FHA on sales housing, as follows: From $20,000 to $22,500 on 1-family homes; from $20,000 to $25,000 on 2-family homes; and from $27,500 to $30,000 on 3-family homes. The existing ceiling of $35,000 on 4-family homes would not be changed.

(b) Amends section 220(d)(3)(B) of the National Housing Act (housing in urban renewal areas) to establish higher dollar limitations on the maximum amount of the mortgage on multifamily housing in urban renewal areas. The new ceilings would be the same as those proposed for FHA's section 207 (regular rental housing) program.

Amends section 220(d)(3)(B) to change the maximum permissible loan ratio from 90 percent of replacement cost (which may include a 10-percent allowance for builder's and sponsor's profit and risk) to 100 percent of replacement cost (excluding any allowance for builder's and sponsor's profit and risk).

Permits exterior land improvements (as defined by the FHA Commissioner) to be included in the mortgage without being computed as part of the per room or per unit cost limitations.

Relocation housing

SEC. 110. Amends section 221 of the National Housing Act (relocation housing) to extend the benefits of the program to any family displaced within the environs of a community that has a workable program.

SEC. 111. (a) Amends section 221(d)(2) in order to—

(1) Increase the maximum insurable loan for the construction or rehabilitation of sales housing from $9,000 to $10,000 in normal cost areas, and from $10,000 to $12,000 in high-cost areas; and

(2) Make eligible for mortgage insurance two, three, and four-family dwellings which meet FHA minimum property standards and appropriate State and local housing ordinances or regulations.

Cost certification

SEC. 113. Amends section 227 of the National Housing Act to revise the cost certification requirements affecting FHA section 220, section 221, and the proposed section 229 in accordance with amendments made by other sections of this bill.

TITLE II. HOUSING FOR THE ELDERLY

SEC. 201. Adds a new section 229 to the National Housing Act to provide a new program of housing for elderly persons.

(1) The dollar limits on the maximum amount of the mortgage would be the same as those proposed for FHA's section 207 (regular rental housing) program.

(2) Would permit insurance of mortgages up to 100 percent of replacement cost for nonprofit corporations, and 100 percent of replacement cost (excluding any allowance for builder's and sponsor's profit and risk) for other than nonprofit corporations.

(3) Would require that not less than 50 percent of the living units in the project be designed specially for use and occupancy by elderly persons. Elderly persons would be given a preference or priority of opportunity to rent all units.

(4) The economic soundness test of FHA's regular rental housing program (sec. 207) would not be applicable to the new program for elderly persons.

(5) The FHA Commissioner would be authorized to establish regulations and restrictions as to rents, charges, capital structure, rate of return, and methods of operation.

(6) The provisions of FHA section 212 would apply the prevailing wage requirement of the Davis-Bacon Act, except that the wages which must be certified under the Davis-Bacon Act may be reduced by such amount as the FHA determines to have been fully credited to a nonprofit mortgagor.

(7) Would include a provision making proprietary nursing homes eligible for FHA mortgage insurance, up to 75 percent of the value of the new or rehabilitated property.

TITLE III. URBAN RENEWAL

Statewide planning

SEC. 301. Amends section 101(b) of the Housing Act of 1949 by directing the HHFA Administrator to encourage the utilization of State agencies to provide effective solutions for urban renewal problems of smaller communities.

Grant authorization

SEC. 302. Amends section 103(b) of the Housing Act of 1949 to provide a 6-year, $2.1 billion slum clearance and urban renewal program, with an annual capital grant authorization of $350 million, which could be increased by $150 million in any one year.

Repayment of uncollectible advances

SEC. 303. Amends section 103(b) of the Housing Act of 1949 to authorize the use of urban renewal grant funds to repay Treasury loans made to finance urban planning advances which are now uncollectible because of cancellation of the project.

Community renewal programs

SEC. 304. Amends section 103 of the Housing Act of 1949 by adding a new subsection (c) to authorize planning grants for the preparation of community renewal programs, which would enable a community to survey its urban renewal needs and resources, and schedule projects.

Technical

SEC. 305. Amends section 105(b) of the Housing Act of 1949 to facilitate public improvements involving the Federal Government and the District of Columbia in connection with urban renewal projects.

SEC. 306. Amends section 106(e) of the Housing Act of 1949 to eliminate the provision in existing law that not more than 12½ percent of the total loan authorization may be obligated in any one State; does not alter the 12½ percent State limitation on grant authorization.

Relocation payments

SEC. 307. (a) Amends section 106(f) of the Housing Act of 1949 to authorize relocation payments when the displacement is a result of governmental activity in an urban renewal area, and of programs of voluntary repair and rehabilitation; increases from $100 to $200 the maximum amount of relocation payments to individuals and families.

(b) Amends section 106 by adding a new subsection (g) to give business concerns which are displaced from urban renewal areas a priority of opportunity, insofar as practicable and desirable (as determined by the local governing body), to purchase or lease commercial or industrial facilities provided in connection with area redevelopment.

Planning requirements

SEC. 308. Amends section 110(b) of the Housing Act of 1949 to authorize the HHFA Administrator to expedite urban renewal projects by permitting him to omit or to simplify present detailed requirements for the urban renewal plan.

Nonresidential development

SEC. 309. Amends section 110(c) of the Housing Act of 1949 to permit up to 15 percent (now 10 percent) of the total capital grant authorization to be used for areas which are not predominantly residential, and which are not to be redeveloped for predominantly residential uses, even if such areas do not include a substantial number of slum dwellings as presently required.

Noncash grants-in-aid

SEC. 310. Amends section 110(d) of the Housing Act of 1949 to provide that where a community has an approved community renewal program, improvements and facilities that are otherwise eligible may be credited as local grants-in-aid to urban renewal projects, provided their commencement does not precede the loan and grant contract for the project by more than 5 years. The same would apply to similar improvements and facilities provided in connection with any renewal project covered by a general neighborhood renewal program.

Credit for interest payments

SEC. 311. Amends section 110(e) of the Housing Act of 1949 to authorize the HHFA to include interest on advances by a city (local public funds) as an item of gross project cost for an urban renewal project.

Uniform date

SEC. 312. Amends section 110(g) of the Housing Act of 1949 to make uniform the date for determining the application of the going Federal rate of interest under urban renewal contracts.

Technical

SEC. 313. Makes conforming amendments.

Federal recognition

SEC. 314. Waives the requirement in section 110(d) of the Housing Act of 1949 for communities whose projects could not obtain Federal recognition during the period from January 1, 1957, through December 31, 1958, because of limitations on the HHFA Administrator to make capital grants or to reserve funds. Under existing law, such Federal recognition is required to enable the local community to include local activities and facilities as noncash grants-in-aid.

Urban planning

SEC. 315. (a) Amends section 701 of the Housing Act of 1954 (grants to assist urban planning) to extend the scope of the urban planning grant program to include any group of adjacent communities, having a total population of less than 25,000, and having common or related urban planning problems resulting from rapid urbanization.

(b) Amends section 701 to increase the authorization for grants to assist urban planning by $10 million (present ceiling is $10 million).

TITLE IV—LOW-RENT HOUSING

Declaration of policy

SEC. 401. Amends section 1 of the U.S. Housing Act of 1937 by adding to the declaration of policy the following new objective: to give local public agencies more responsibility for the operation of their projects.

Rents and income limits

SEC. 402. Amends several sections of the U.S. Housing Act of 1937 to permit local public agencies to set rents and income limits for their low-rent projects, subject to a statutory ceiling on income limits.

(a) and (b) technical. Amend sections 2(1) and 15(7)(b) to delete provisions to be covered by other sections of the act.

(c) Amends section 15(8)(a) to authorize the local agency to fix maximum income limits for admission and continued occupancy: (1) The present $100 exemption for each minor or adult dependent is eliminated, (2) the 20-percent gap requirement is waived for displaced families. Also removes the Public Housing Administration's authority to require the prior approval of specific income limits set by the local agency.

(d) and (e) amend sections 15(8)(b) and 15(8)(d) to remove references to the Public Housing Administration's power of prior approval of specific income limits.

(f) Repeals section 502(b) of the Housing Act of 1948, relating to the exemption of benefits for disability or death occurring in connection with military service, which is incorporated in the basic act by subsection (c) above.

Annual contributions and residual receipts

SEC. 403. (a) Amends section 10(b) of the U.S. Housing Act of 1937 to provide that fixed annual contributions be equal to level debt service (principal plus interest) on outstanding debt.

(b) Amends section 10(c) to provide that residual receipts (rental income minus operating costs) be divided on the basis of two-thirds for advance amortization of capital debt and one-third to the local agency solely for low-rent housing use.

Also require a local agency to submit an independent audit and independent certification of compliance with the act, and provides that such certification shall, in the absence of fraud or of evidence of violation of the 1937 act, or waste or extravagance or neglect, or expenditures which are not reasonably compatible with the operation of low-rental public housing disclosed by financial post-audits pursuant to sections 814 and 816 of the Housing Act of 1954, be accepted as final and conclusive by all officers of the Federal Government.

(c) Technical. Amends section 22(b) to delete a reference which would no longer appear in the act, as amended.

Authorization

SEC. 404. Amends section 10(i) of the act of 1937 by increasing the authorization for new annual contribution contracts by an additional 17,500 units to become available July 1, 1959. It would also extend from 2 to 4 years the period during which the existing authorizations would be available. This would make available for 2 additional years, until July 31, 1960, any units not contracted for under the first authorization of 35,000 units which expired July 31, 1958, would extend the second authorization of 35,000 units to July 1, 1961, and make the new authorization of 17,500 units available until July 1, 1962.

Amendments to existing contracts

SEC. 405. Amends the United States Housing Act of 1937 by adding a new section 30 to provide that existing annual contribution contracts shall be revised, upon request of local agencies, in accordance with the terms of the act of 1937 as it is amended at any time, provided that the interest of the holders of outstanding bonds is not jeopardized.

Low-rent housing in urban renewal areas

SEC. 406. Amends section 107 of the Housing Act of 1949 to facilitate the development of low-rent housing in urban renewal areas. Under existing law, when a new public housing project is located outside of an urban renewal area, the locality is required to make a local contribution in the form of tax exemption, but if located within an urban renewal area a further local contribution is required equal to one-third of the write-down in land value. The proposed amendment would eliminate this difference by accepting tax exemption as the only required local contribution for low-rent projects in urban renewal areas.

TITLE V. COLLEGE HOUSING

SEC. 501. Amends section 401(d) of the Housing Act of 1950 to increase the revolving fund for college housing loans by $400 million (the present ceiling is $925 million). Of the $400 million increase, $50 million is reserved for other educational facilities increasing the reservation for this purpose from $100 million to $150 million, and $50 million is reserved for student-nurse and intern housing facilities, increasing the reservation for this purpose from $25 million to $75 million.

SEC. 502. (a) Amends title IV of the Housing Act of 1950 by adding new sections 405 and 406 which authorize the Administrator to make and guarantee loans to educational institutions for the construction of new, or rehabilitation of existing classrooms, laboratories, and related facilities, including equipment and utilities.

(b) Authorizes a revolving fund of $125 million to finance the new loan program, and $250 million to finance the new guaranty program.

TITLE VI. ARMED SERVICES HOUSING

SEC. 601. (a) Amends section 803(a) of the National Housing Act to extend the military housing program (secs. 803 and 809) for 1 year, until June 30, 1960.

(b) Amends section 803(b) to increase from 25 years to 30 years the maximum maturity of mortgages insured under this section.

SEC. 602. (a) Amends title VIII of the National Housing Act by adding a new section 810 to authorize the FHA Commissioner to insure mortgages on single-family and multifamily projects, the need for which is certified by the Secretary of Defense. Insurance would be on an acceptable-risk rather than an economic-soundness basis. The projects would be held for rental for a period of not less than 5 years unless released by the military for sale. Priority in rental or sale is given to military personnel and essential civilian personnel of the armed services as evidenced by certification issued by the Secretary of Defense.

(b) Amends section 808 of the National Housing Act to make applicable the provisions of section 227 of the National Housing Act (cost certification).

(c) Amends section 212(a) of the National Housing Act to make applicable the prevailing wage requirements of the Davis-Bacon Act.

(d) Amends section 305(f) of the National Housing Act to make section 810 mortgages eligible for purchase by the Federal National Mortgage Association under its special assistance function.

SEC. 603. (a) and (b) Amend sections 404 (a) and (b) of the Housing Amendments of 1955 to permit the Secretary of Defense to acquire FHA section 207 rental projects, if completed prior to July 1, 1952, and certified by the Department of Defense as necessary for military housing purposes, and to make the acquisition of such projects mandatory if section 803 housing is constructed in the area of the FHA section 207 projects.

(c) Amends section 407(f) of the act entitled "An act to authorize certain construction at military installations, and for other purposes," approved August 30, 1957, in order to exempt FHA section 207 rental projects covered by this section from being declared substandard because the units in such projects do not meet minimum floor area prescribed for other military housing.

TITLE VII. MISCELLANEOUS

Federal National Mortage Association

SEC. 701. (a) Amends section 302(b) of the National Housing Act to increase from $15,000 to $20,000 the dollar limit for mortgages purchased under the Federal National Mortgage Association's secondary market operations.

(b) Amends section 305(b) of the National Housing Act to extend for 2 years (until August 7, 1960) the requirement that the Federal National Mortgage Association purchase mortgages under its special assistance functions at par.

Farm housing research

SEC. 702. Amends section 603 (c) of the Housing Act of 1957 to extend the farm housing research program for a period of 3 years, beginning July 1, 1959, and authorizes an annual appropriation of $100,000.

Surveys of public works planning

SEC. 703. Amends section 702 of the Housing Act of 1954 by adding a new subsection (f) to authorize the Administrator to use, in any one fiscal year, up to $50,000 of the revolving fund to conduct surveys of the status and current volume of State and local public works planning and surveys of estimated requirements for State and local public works.

SEC. 704. (a) Amends section 500(d) of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 to permit the VA to expand the existing class of "supervised lenders" to include a new category of mortgage lenders. A "supervised lender" is entitled to make a VA loan without prior approval by the VA. The new category would consist of "approved mortgagees" under the certified agency program of the FHA. The inclusion of the new category would not be automatic; each applicant must be acceptable to the VA.

(b) Amends sections 504(c) and 514 of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 to authorize the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to prohibit builders and lenders from participating in the VA home loan programs, if such builders or lenders have been barred from the benefits of the National Housing Act by the Federal Housing Commissioner.

(c) Amends section 513(d) of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 to provide an additional $300 million for the VA direct home loan program.

Disposal of projects

SEC. 5. (a) Amends section 607 of the act of October 14, 1940 (Lanham Act) to authorize the PHA Commissioner to modify the terms of any contract relating to any housing projects disposed of by him to cooperatives.

(b) Amends section 406(c) of the Housing Act of 1956 to extend for a period of 2 years the time in which military personnel may continue to occupy war housing projects PA–36011 and PA–36012 (Passyunk) which are presently owned by the Housing Authority of Philadelphia, Pa.

Voluntary home mortgage credit program

SEC. 706. Amends section 610 of the Housing Act of 1954 to extend the voluntary home mortgage credit program for 1 year, until July 31, 1960.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may lie on the desk through Tuesday, January 13, so as to give an opportunity for other Senators to cosponsor it should they so desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that the bill may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 57) is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Housing Act of 1959."

TITLE I—FHA INSURANCE PROGRAMS

SEC. 101. Section 2(a) of the National Housing Act is amended by striking out "September 30, 1959" and inserting in lieu thereof "September 30, 1960."

SEC. 102. (a) Section 8(g) of the National Housing Act is amended by striking out "and (h) of section 204" and inserting in lieu thereof "(h), (j), and (k) of section 204."

(b) Sections 213(e), 220(f)(1), 221(g)(1), 222 (e), and 809(e) of such act are amended respectively by striking out "and (j) of section 204" and inserting in lieu thereof "(j) and (k) of section 204."

SEC. 103. (a) Section 203(b)(2) of the National Housing Act is amended by striking out all that precedes the second semicolon and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(2) Involve a principal obligation (including such initial service charges, appraisal, inspection, and other fees as the Commissioner shall approve) in an amount not to exceed $22,500 in the case of property upon which there is located a dwelling designed principally for a one-family residence; or $25,000 in the case of a two-family residence (whether or not such one- or two-family residences may be intended to be rented temporarily for school purposes); or $30,000 in the case of a three-family residence."

(b) Section 203(b)(8) of such act is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a colon and the following: "Provided, That such 85 percent limitation shall not be applicable if the mortgagor and mortgagee assume responsibility in a manner satisfactory to the Commissioner for the reduction of the mortgage by an amount not less than 15 percent of the outstanding principal amount thereof in the event the mortgaged property is not, prior to the due date of the 18th amortization payment of the mortgage, sold to a purchaser acceptable to the Commissioner who is the occupant of the property and who assumes and agrees to pay the mortgage indebtedness."

(c) Section 203(i) of such act is amended by striking out "$8,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$9,000."

SEC. 104. Section 207 of the National Housing Act is amended—

(1) by striking out the following parenthetical phrases in subsection (b): "(except provisions relating to housing for elderly persons)", and "(except with respect to housing designed for elderly persons, with occupancy preference therefor, as provided in the paragraph following paragraph (3) of subsection (c))";

(2) by striking out in paragraph (3) of subsection (c)—

(i) "$2,250" in both places where it appears therein and inserting in lieu thereof "$2,500";

(ii) "$8,100" in both places where it appears therein and inserting in lieu thereof "$9,000";

(iii) "$2,700" and inserting in lieu thereof "$3,000";

(iv) "$8,400" and inserting in lieu thereof "$9,400";

(v) "$1,000 per room" and inserting in lieu thereof "$1,250 per room";

(vi) "$1,000 per space" and inserting in lieu thereof "$1,500 per space"; and

(vii) "$300,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$500,000";

(3) by striking out in subsection (c) the unnumbered paragraph following paragraph (3); and

(4) by striking out in both places where it appears in subsection (f) "section 210 and section 213" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "sections 210, 213, and 229."

SEC. 105. (a) Section 213(b)(2) of the National Housing Act is amended to read as follows:

"(2) not to exceed, for such part of the property or project as may be attributable to dwelling use $2,500 per room (or $9,000 per family unit if the number of rooms in such property or project is less than four per family unit), and not to exceed 97 per centum of the amount which the Commissioner estimates will be the replacement cost of the property or project when the proposed physical improvements are completed: Provided, That as to projects which consist of elevator type structures the Commission may, in his discretion, increase the dollar amount limitation of $2,500 per room to not to exceed $3,000 per room and the dollar amount limitation of $9,000 per family unit to not to exceed $9,400 per family unit, as the case may be, to compensate for the higher costs incident to the construction of elevator-type structures of sound standards of construction and design: Provided further, That the Commissioner may, by regulation, increase any of the foregoing dollar amounts limitations by not to exceed $1,250 per room, without regard to the number of rooms being less than four, or four or more, in any geographical area where he finds that cost levels so require: Provided further, That in the case of a mortgagor of the character described in paragraph (3) of subsection (a) the mortgage shall involve a principal obligation in an amount not to exceed 85 per centum of the amount which the Commissioner estimates will be the replacement cost of the property or project when the proposed physical improvements are completed: And provided further, That upon the sale of a property or project by a mortgagor of the character described in paragraph (3) of subsection (a) to a nonprofit cooperative ownership housing corporation or trust within two years after the completion of such property or project the mortgage given to finance such sale shall involve a principal obligation in an amount not to exceed the maximum amount computed in accordance with this subsection without regard to the preceding proviso."

(b) Section 213(d) of such act is amended by adding at the end thereof a new sentence as follows: "Property held by a corporation or trust of the character described in paragraph numbered (2) of subsection (a) of this section or by a mortgagor of the character described in paragraph numbered (3) of subsection (a) of this section which is covered by a mortgage insured under this section may include such community facilities as the Commissioner deems adequate to serve the occupants."

(1) by striking from the first sentence "the Territory of"; and

(2) by striking from such sentence "mortgage amounts provided in this act," and inserting in lieu thereof "mortgage amounts (including increased mortgage amounts in geographical areas where cost levels so require) provided in this act,".

SEC. 107. (a) Section 217 of the National Housing Act is amended by striking out "$7,000,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$11,000,000,000."

(b) Section 217 of such act is amended, effective July 1, 1959, by (1) striking out "July 1, 1956", and inserting in lieu thereof "July 1, 1959", and (2) striking out "$11,000,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$4,000,000,000."

SEC. 108. Section 218 of the National Housing Act is repealed.

SEC. 109. (a) Clause (i) of subsection (d)(3)(A) of section 220 of the National Housing Act is amended by striking out all that precedes the second semicolon and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(A) (i) involve a principal obligation (including such initial service charges, appraisal, inspection, and other fees as the Commissioner shall approve) in an amount not to exceed $22,500 in the case of property upon which there is located a dwelling designed principally for a one-family residence; or $25,000 in the case of a two-family residence; or $30,000 in the case of a three-family residence."

(b) Subsection (d)(3)(B) of section 220 of such act is amended to read as follows:

"(B) (i) not exceed $12,500,000, or, if executed by a mortgagor coming within the provisions of paragraph (2) (B) of this subsection (d), not exceed $50 million; and

"(ii) not exceed (in the case of a property or project approved for mortgage insurance prior to the beginning of construction) the Commissioner's estimate of the replacement cost of the property or project when the proposed improvements are completed (the replacement cost may include the land, the proposed physical improvements, utilities within the boundaries of the land, architect's fees, taxes, interest during construction, and other miscellaneous charges incident to construction and approved by the Commissioner, but shall not include any allowance for builder's and sponsor's profit and risk; or

"(iii) not exceed 90 per centum of the Commissioners estimate of the value of the property or project when the proposed improvements are completed if the proceeds of the mortgage are to be used for the repair or rehabilitation of a property or project; and

"(iv) not exceed, for such part of such property or project as may be attributable to dwelling use (excluding exterior land improvements as defined by the Commissioner), $2,500 per room (or $9,000 per family unit if the number of rooms in such property or project is less than four per family unit): Provided, That the Commissioner may, in his discretion, increase the dollar amount limitation of $2,500 per room to not to exceed $3,000 per room, and the dollar amount limitation of $9,000 per family unit to not to exceed $9,400 per family unit, as the case may be, to compensate for the higher costs incident to the construction of elevator-type structures: And provided further, That the Commissioner may, in his discretion, increase any of the foregoing dollar amount limitations by not to exceed $1,250 per room without regard to the number of rooms being less than four, or four or more, in any geographical area where he finds that cost levels so require."

SEC. 110. (a) The first paragraph of section 221(a) of the National Housing Act is amended to read as follows:

"This section is designed to supplement systems of mortgage insurance under other provisions of the National Housing Act in order to assist (1) in relocating families from urban renewal areas, (2) in relocating families to be displaced as the result of governmental action in a community respecting which (A) the Housing and Home Finance Administrator has made the certification to the Commissioner provided for by subsection 101(c) of the Housing Act of 1949, as amended, or (B) there is being carried out a project covered by a Federal aid contract executed, or prior approval granted, by the Housing and Home Finance Administrator under title I of the Housing Act of 1949, as amended, before the effective date of the Housing Act of 1954, or (C) there is being carried out an urban renewal project assisted under section 111 of the Housing Act of 1949, as amended, and (3) in relocating families residing in the environs of a community described in clause (2) which are to be displaced as the result of governmental action."

(b) The second paragraph of section 221 (a) of such act is amended—

(1) by inserting before the colon preceding the first proviso a comma and the following: "and in the environs of such communities as provided in clause (3) above";

(2) by striking out "in any such community" in the second proviso and inserting in lieu thereof "in or near any such community";

(3) by striking out "(1)" in the third proviso and inserting in lieu thereof "(2)(A)"; and

(4) by striking out "(1)", "(2)", and "(3)", wherever they appear in the last proviso, and inserting in lieu thereof respectively, "(2)(A)", (2)(B)", and "(2)(C)".

(c) Section 101 (c) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended by striking out "if the mortgaged property is in a community referred to in clause (2) of section 221(a) of said act", and inserting in lieu thereof "if the mortgaged property is in an area described in clause (3) of section 221(a) of said act, or in a community referred to in clause (2)(B) of said section".

(d) Section 101(c) of the Housing Act of 1949 is further amended by striking out "in a community" in clause (iii) of the last proviso.

SEC. 111. (a) Section 221(d)(2) of the National Housing Act is amended to read as follows:

"(2) be secured by property upon which there is located a dwelling conforming to applicable standards prescribed by the Commissioner under subsection (f) of this section, and meeting the requirements of all State laws, or local ordinances or regulations, relating to the public health or safety, zoning, or otherwise, as may be applicable thereto, and shall involve a principal obligation (including such initial service charges, appraisal, inspection, and other fees as the Commissioner shall approve) in an amount (A) not to exceed (i) $10,000 in the case of a property upon which there is located a dwelling designed principally for a single-family residence, except that the Commissioner may by regulation increase this amount to not to exceed $12,000 in any geographical area where he finds that cost levels so require, (ii) $18,000 in the case of a property upon which there is located a dwelling principally designed for two-family residence, except that the Commissioner may by regulation increase this amount to not to exceed $20,000 in any geographical area where he finds that cost levels so require, (iii) $25,000 in the case of a property upon which there is located a dwelling designed principally for a three-family residence, except that the Commissioner may by regulation increase this amount to not to exceed $27,500 in any geographical area where he finds that cost levels so require, (iv) $32,000 in the case of property upon which there is located a dwelling designed principally for a four-family residence, except that the Commissioner may by regulation increase this amount to not to exceed $35,000 in any geographical area where he finds that cost levels so require; and (B) not to exceed the appraised value (as of the date the mortgage is accepted for insurance) of any such property, less such amount, in the case of any mortgagor, as may be necessary to comply with the succeeding provisos: Provided, That if the mortgagor is the owner and an occupant of the property at the time of the insurance, he shall have paid on account of the property at least (i) $200 in the case of a single-family dwelling, (ii) $400 in the case of a two-family dwelling, (iii) $600 in the case of a three-family dwelling, and (iv) $800 in the case of a four-family dwelling, in cash or its equivalent which amount may include amounts to cover settlement costs and initial payments for taxes, hazard insurance, mortgage insurance premium, and other prepaid expenses: Provided further, That nothing contained herein shall preclude the Commissioner from issuing a commitment to insure, and insuring a mortgage pursuant thereto, where the mortgagor is not the owner and an occupant of the property, if the property is to be built or acquired and repaired or rehabilitated for sale, and the insured mortgage financing is required to facilitate the construction, or the repair or rehabilitation, of the dwelling and to provide financing pending the subsequent sale thereof to a qualified owner who is also an occupant thereof, but in such instances the mortgage shall not exceed 85 per centum of the appraised value: And provided further, That the Commissioner shall prescribe such procedures as in his judgment are necessary to secure to families, referred to in subsection (a) above, priorities in occupancy of the remaining units of two-, three-, and four-family dwellings after occupancy of one unit by the owner; or".

(b) Section 221 of such Act is further amended—

(1) by striking out "$9000" and "$10,000" in paragraph (3) of subsection (d) and inserting in lieu thereof "$10,000" and "$12,000", respectively;

(2) by striking out of paragraph (3) of subsection (d) "not in excess of the Commissioner's estimate of the value of the property or project when constructed or repaired and rehabilitated, for use as rental accommodations for 10 or more families eligible for occupancy as provided in this section; and", and inserting in lieu thereof "not in excess of (1) in the case of new construction, the amount which the Commissioner estimates will be the replacement cost of the property or project when the proposed improvements are completed (the replacement cost may include the land, the proposed physical improvements, utilities within the boundaries of the land, architect's fees, taxes, interest during construction, and other miscellaneous charges incident to construction and approved by the Commissioner), or (2), in the case of repair and rehabilitation, the Commissioner's estimate of the value of the property when the proposed repair and rehabilitation is completed: Provided, That such property or project, when constructed, or repaired and rehabilitated, shall be for use as rental accommodations for 10 or more families eligible for occupancy as provided in this section; or";

(3) by inserting the following new paragraph (4) in subsection (d) and renumbering the present paragraph (4) of subsection (d) as paragraph (5):

"(4) if executed by a mortgagor which is not a nonprofit organization, and which is approved by the Commissioner—

"(i) not exceed (in the case of a property or project approved for mortgage insurance prior to the beginning of construction) the Commissioner's estimate of the replacement cost of the property or project when the proposed improvements are completed (the replacement cost may include the land, the proposed physical improvements, utilities within the boundaries of the land, architect's fees, taxes, interest during construction, and other miscellaneous charges incident to construction and approved by the Commissioner, but shall not include any allowance for builder's and sponsor's profit and risk);

"(ii) not exceed the Commissioner's estimate of the value of the property or project when the proposed repair and rehabilitation is completed if the proceeds of the mortgage are to be used for the repair and rehabilitation of a property or project: Provided, That such property or project when constructed, or repaired and rehabilitated, shall be for use as rental accommodations for 10 or more families eligible for occupancy as provided in this section: And provided further, That the Commissioner may, in his discretion, require the mortgagor to be regulated or restricted as to rents or sales, charges, capital structure, rate of return and methods of operation, and for such purpose the Commissioner may make contracts with and acquire for not to exceed $100 stock or interest in any such mortgagor as the Commissioner may deem necessary to render effective such restrictions or regulations, with such stock or interest being paid for out of the section 221 Housing Insurance Fund and being required to be redeemed by the mortgagor at par upon the termination of all obligations of the Commissioner under the insurance; and"; and

(4) by striking out "paragraph (3)" in paragraph (2) of subsection (g) and inserting in lieu thereof "paragraphs (3) and (4)."

(c) Section 212(a) of such act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"The provisions of this section shall apply to the insurance of any mortgage under section 221 which covers property on which there is located a dwelling or dwellings designed principally for residential use for 10 or more families."

SEC. 112. Section 222(b) of the National Housing Act is amended—

(1) by inserting "or 203(i)" after "203 (b)" in clause (1); and

(2) by striking out "$17,100;" in clause (2) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "$20,000, except that in the case of a mortgage meeting the requirements of section 203(i) such principal obligation shall not exceed $8,000;".

SEC. 113. Section 227 of the National Housing Act is amended—

(1) by striking out in subsection (a) clause (iv) and everything following clause

(iv) and inserting in lieu thereof "(iv) under section 221 if the mortgagor meets the requirements of paragraph (3) or paragraph (4) of subsection (d) thereof, (v) under section 229, or (vi) under section 803 or 810:": and

(2) by striking out in subsection (c) the last two sentences and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "In the case of a mortgage insured under section 220(d)(3)(B)(ii), section 221(d)(4), or section 229(c)(4), the 'actual cost' computed pursuant to the provisions of this paragraph (c) shall not include any allowance for builder's and sponsor's profit and risk."

SEC. 201. (a) Title II of the National Housing Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 229. (a) The purpose of this section is to assist in relieving the shortage of housing for elderly persons and to increase the supply of rental housing for elderly persons. It is further the purpose of this section to assist in the provision of urgently needed nursing homes for the care and treatment of persons, particularly elderly persons.

"For the purposes of this section—

"(1) The term 'housing' means eight or more new or rehabilitated living units, not less than 50 percent of which are specially designed for the use and occupancy of elderly persons;

"(2) The term 'elderly person' means any person, married or single, who is 60 years of age or more;

"(3) The term 'nursing home' means a proprietary facility which is or will be licensed or regulated by law, which provides continuous medical and nursing care to the long-term, convalescent, infirm, or elderly patient in a home-like atmosphere, furnishing facilities and comforts normally found in a patient's home, and which provides, in addition thereto, such specialized service, equipment, and safety features as may be required for the safe, proper, and adequate care of patients at all times; and

"(4) The terms 'mortgage', 'mortgagee', 'mortgagor', and 'maturity date' shall have the meanings respectively set forth in section 207 of this act.

"(b) The Commissioner is authorized to insure any mortgage (including advances on mortgages during construction) in accordance with the provisions of this section upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe and to make commitments for insurance of such mortgages prior to the date of their execution or disbursement thereon.

"(c) To be eligible for insurance under this section, a mortgage to provide housing for elderly persons shall—

"(1) involve a principal obligation in an amount not to exceed $12,500,000 or, if executed by Federal or State instrumentalities, municipal corporate instrumentalities of one or more States, or nonprofit development or housing corporations restricted by Federal or State laws or regulations of State banking or insurance departments as to rents, charges, capital structures, rate of return, or methods of operation, not to exceed $50,000,000;

"(2) not exceed, for such part of such property or project as may be attributable to dwelling use, $9,000 per dwelling unit: Provided, That the Commissioner may, in his discretion, increase the dollar amount limitation of $9,000 per unit to not to exceed $9,400 per unit to compensate for the higher costs incident to the construction of elevator-type structures and may increase each of the foregoing dollar amount limitations by not to exceed $1,250 per room in any geographical area where he finds that cost levels so require;

"(3) if executed by a mortgagor which is a private nonprofit corporation or association or other acceptable private nonprofit organization regulated or supervised under Federal or State laws or by political subdivisions of States, or agencies thereof, or by the Commissioner under a regulatory agreement or otherwise, as to rents, charges, and methods of operation, in such form and in such manner as, in the opinion of the Commissioner, will effectuate the purpose of this section, involve a principal obligation not in excess of the amount which the Commissioner estimates will be the replacement cost of the property or project when the proposed improvements are completed (the replacement cost may include the land, the proposed physical improvements, utilities within the boundaries of the land, architect's fees, taxes, interest during construction, and other miscellaneous charges incident to construction and approved by the Commissioner);

"(4) if executed by a mortgagor approved by the Commissioner but which is not a nonprofit organization, involve a principle obligation not in excess of the Commissioner's estimate of the replacement cost of the property or project when the proposed improvements are completed (the replacement cost may include the land, the proposed physical improvements, utilities within the boundaries of the land, architect's fees, taxes, interest during construction, and other miscellaneous charges incident to construction and approved by the Commissioner, but shall not include any allowance for builder's and sponsor's profit and risk): Provided, That the Commissioner may in his discretion require such mortgagor to be regulated or restricted as to rents or sales, charges, capital structure, rate of return and methods of operation, and for such purpose the Commissioner may make contracts with and acquire for not to exceed $100 stock or interest in any such mortgagor as the Commissioner may deem necessary to render effective such restrictions or regulations; such stock or interest shall be paid for out of the section 207 Housing Insurance Fund and shall be redeemed by the mortgagor at par upon the termination of all obligations of the Commissioner under the insurance;

"(5) provide for a complete amortization by periodic payments within such terms as the Commissioner shall prescribe;

"(6) bear interest (exclusive of premium charges for insurance) at not to exceed 4½ per centum per annum on the amount of the principal obligation outstanding at any time;

"(7) cover a property or project which is approved for mortgage insurance prior to the beginning of construction, with 50 per centum or more of the units therein specially designed for the use and occupancy of elderly persons in accordance with standards established by the Commissioner, and which may include such commercial and special facilities as the Commissioner deems adequate to serve the occupants.

"(d) In order to carry out the purpose stated in the second sentence of subsection (a), the Commissioner is authorized to insure any mortgage which covers a new or rehabilitated nursing home, subject to the following conditions:

"(1) The mortgage shall be executed by a mortgagor approved by the Commissioner. The Commissioner may in his discretion, require any such mortgagor to be regulated or restricted as to charges and methods of operation, and, in addition thereto, if the mortgagor is a corporate entity, as to capital structure and rate of return. As an aid to the regulation or restriction of any mortgagor with respect to any of the foregoing matters, the Commissioner may make such contracts with and/or acquire, for not to exceed $100, stock or interest in any such mortgagor as he may deem necessary. Any stock or interest so purchased shall be paid for out of the section 207 Housing Insurance Fund, and may be redeemed by the mortgagor at par upon the termination of all obligations of the Commissioner under the insurance.

"(2) The mortgage shall involve a principal obligation in an amount not to exceed $12,500,000, and not to exceed 75 per centum of the estimated value of the property or project when the proposed improvements are completed.

"(3) The mortgage shall—

"(i) provide for complete amortization by periodic payments within such terms as the Commissioner shall prescribe; and

"(ii) bear interest (exclusive of premium charges for insurance) at not to exceed 4½ per centum per annum of the amount of the principal obligation outstanding at any time.

"(e) In carrying out the provisions of this section with respect to the insurance of mortgages on properties or projects designed for use as nursing homes, the Commissioner shall consult with and secure the advice and recommendations of the Public Health Service of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

"(f) The Commissioner may consent to the release of a part or parts of the mortgaged property or project from the lien of any mortgage insured under this section upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, and shall prescribe such procedures as in his judgment are necessary to secure to elderly persons a preference or priority of opportunity to rent the dwellings included in such property or project.

"(g) The provisions of subsections (d), (e), (f), (g), (h), (i), (j), (k), (l), (m), (n), and (p) of section 207 shall apply to mortgages insured under this section and all references therein to section 207 shall refer to this section."

(b) Section 212(a) of such act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "The provisions of this section shall also apply to the insurance of any mortgage under section 229 except that compliance with such provisions may be waived by the Federal Housing Commissioner in such cases or classes of cases in which laborers or mechanics, not otherwise employed at any time on the project, voluntarily donate their services without compensation for the purpose of lowering the costs of construction and the Federal Housing Commissioner determines that any amounts thereby saved are fully credited to the nonprofit corporation association or other organization undertaking the construction."

TITLE III.—URBAN RENEWAL

SEC. 301. Section 101(b) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended by adding at the end thereof a new sentence as follows: "The Administrator shall particularly encourage the utilization of local public agencies established by the States to operate on a statewide basis in behalf of smaller communities within the State, whenever that arrangement provides an effective solution to community development or redevelopment problems in such communities, and is approved by resolution or ordinance of the governing bodies of the affected communities."

SEC. 302. The first sentence of section 103(b) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended to read as follows: "The Administrator, on and after July 1, 1949, may, with the approval of the President, contract to make capital grants, with respect to projects assisted under this title, and to make grants pursuant to subsection (c) of this section, aggregating not to exceed $1,250 million which limit shall be increased by $850 million on the date of enactment of the Housing Act of 1959, and by $350 million on July 1 in each of the years 1959 through 1963; except that any such authorized increase may be increased by additional amounts aggregating not more than $150 million in any fiscal year upon a determination by the Administrator, with the approval of the President, that such additional amounts are necessary to carry out the urban renewal objectives of this title: Provided, That the amount of capital grants contracted for under this title prior to July 1, 1964, shall not exceed an aggregate of $3,350 million."

SEC. 303. Section 103(b) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a colon and the following: "Provided, That any amounts so appropriated shall also be available for repaying to the Secretary of the Treasury, for application to notes of the Administrator, the principal amounts of any funds advanced to local public agencies under this title which the Administrator determines to be uncollectible because of the termination of activities for which such advances were made, together with the interest paid or accrued to the Secretary (as determined by him) attributable to notes given by the Administrator in connection with such advances, but all such repayments shall constitute a charge against the authorization to make contracts for capital grants contained in this section: Provided further, That no such determination of the Administrator shall be construed to prejudice the rights of the United States with respect to any such advance".

"(c) The Administrator may contract to make grants for the preparation or completion of community renewal programs, which may include, without being limited to, (i) the identification of slum areas or blighted, deteriorated, or deteriorating areas in the community, (ii) the measurement of the nature and degree of blight and blighting factors within such areas, (iii) determination of the financial, relocation, and other resources needed and available to renew such areas, (iv) the identification of potential project areas and, where feasible, types of urban renewal action contemplated within such areas, and (v) scheduling or programing of urban renewal activities. Such programs shall conform, in the determination of the governing body of the locality, to the general plan of the locality as a whole. The Administrator may establish reasonable requirements respecting the scope and content of such programs. No contract for a grant pursuant to this subsection shall be made, unless the governing body of the locality involved has approved the preparation or completion of the community renewal program, and the submission by the local public agency of an application for such a grant. Notwithstanding section 110 (h) or the use in any other provision of this title of the term 'local public agency' or 'local public agencies', the Administrator may make grants pursuant to this subsection for the preparation or completion of a community renewal program to a single local public body authorized to perform the planning work necessary to such preparation or completion. No grant made pursuant to this subsection shall exceed two-thirds of the cost (as such cost is determined or estimated by the Administrator) of the preparation or completion of the community renewal program for which such grant is made."

SEC. 305. Section 105(b) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended by adding the following before the semicolon at the end thereof: ": And provided further, That, with respect to any improvements of a type which it is otherwise authorized to undertake, any Federal agency (as defined in section 3(b) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended, and also including the District of Columbia or any agency thereof) is hereby authorized to become obligated in accordance with this subsection (c), except that clause (ii) of this subsection shall apply to such Federal agency only to the extent that it is authorized (and funds have been authorized or appropriated and made available) to make the improvements involved".

SEC. 306. Section 106(e) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended by striking out all before the proviso and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Not more than 12½ per centum of the grant funds provided for in this title shall be expended in any one State:".

SEC. 307. (a) (1) The first sentence of section 106(f)(2) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended to read as follows:

"(2) As used in this subsection, the term 'relocation payments' means payments by a local public agency to individuals, families, and business concerns for their reasonable and necessary moving expenses and any actual direct losses of property except goodwill or profit (which are incurred on and after August 7, 1956, and for which reimbursement or compensation is not otherwise made) resulting from their displacement from an urban renewal area made necessary by (i) the acquisition of real property by a local public agency or by any other public body, (ii) code enforcement activities undertaken in connection with an urban renewal project, or (iii) a program of voluntary rehabilitation of buildings or other improvements in accordance with an urban renewal plan: Provided, That such payments shall not be made after completion of the project or if completion is deferred solely for the purpose of obtaining further relocation payments."

(2) The second sentence of section 106(f)(2) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended by striking out "$100" in each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "$200."

(3) No relocation payments under section 106(f) of the Housing Act of 1949 shall be made for expenses or losses incurred prior to the effective date of this act, except to the extent that such payments were authorized by such section as it existed prior to such effective date.

(b) Section 106 of such act is further amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection as follows:

"(g) The Administrator shall require in connection with any urban renewal project—

"(1) with respect to which a contract for capital grants is executed under this title, and

"(2) which involves the redevelopment of any part of an urban renewal area for commercial or industrial purposes, that business concerns which are displaced from such urban renewal area be granted, if and to the extent determined by the governing body of the locality to be practicable and desirable, a priority of opportunity to purchase or lease commercial or industrial facilities provided in connection with such redevelopment."

SEC. 308. Section 110(b) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended by striking out clause (2) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(2) shall be sufficiently complete to indicate, to the extent required by the Administrator, the general nature of such redevelopment, improvements, and rehabilitation as may be proposed to be carried out in the urban renewal areas, the general land uses, and general nature of building requirements and density standards."

SEC. 309. Section 110(c) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended by striking out the second paragraph following the paragraph numbered (6) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Financial assistance shall not be extended under this title with respect to any urban renewal area which is not predominantly residential in character and which, under the urban renewal plan therefor, is not to be redeveloped for predominantly residential uses: Provided, That if the governing body of the local public agency determines that the redevelopment of such an area for predominantly nonresidential uses is necessary for the proper development of the community, the Administrator may extend financial assistance under this title for such a project: Provided further, That the aggregate amount of capital grants contracted to be made pursuant to this title with respect to such projects shall not exceed 15 per centum of the aggregate amount of grants authorized by this title to be contracted for."

SEC. 310. Section 110(d) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of this subsection, in any community for which there exists a General Neighborhood Renewal Plan meeting the requirements of subsection (d) of section 102 hereof or a community renewal program meeting the requirements of the Administrator established pursuant to section 103(c) hereof, no subsequent donation or provision of a public improvement or public facility of a type falling within the purview of this subsection shall be deemed to be ineligible as a local grant-in-aid for any project in conformity with such General Neighborhood Renewal Plan or such community renewal program solely on the basis that the construction of such improvement or facility was commenced without notification to the Administrator or prior to Federal recognition of such project, if such construction was commenced not more than five years prior to the authorization by the Administrator of a contract for loan or capital grant for the project."

"(e) 'Gross project cost' shall comprise (1) the amount of the expenditures by the local public agency with respect to any and all undertakings necessary to carry out the project (including the payment of carrying charges, but not beyond the point where the project is completed), and (2) the amount of such local grants-in-aid as are furnished in forms other than cash. There may be included as part of the gross project cost, under any contract for loan or grant heretofore or hereafter executed under this title, with respect to moneys of the local public agency which are actually expended and outstanding for undertakings (other than in the form of local grants-in-aid) necessary to carry out the project, in the absence of carrying charges on such moneys, an amount in lieu of carrying charges which might otherwise have been payable thereon for the period such moneys are expended and outstanding but not beyond the point where the project is completed, computed for each 6-month period or portion thereof, at an interest rate equivalent to the simple average per annum on new issues of U.S. Government 91 day Treasury bills issued during the 10 weeks immediately prior to January 1 and July 1 of such 6 month period: Provided, That such amount may be computed on the net total of all such moneys of the local public agency remaining expended and outstanding, less other moneys received from the project undertaken in excess of project expenditures, in all projects of the local public agency under this title, and allocated, as the Administrator may determine, to each of such projects. With respect to a project for which a contract for capital grant has been executed on a three-fourths basis pursuant to the proviso in the second sentence of section 103 (a), gross project cost shall include, in lieu of the amount specified in clause (1) above, the amount of the expenditures by the local public agency with respect to the following undertakings and activities necessary to carry out such project:

"(i) acquisition of land (but only to the extent of the consideration paid to the owner and not title, appraisal, negotiating, legal, or any other expenditures of the local public agency incidental to acquiring land), disposition of land, demolition and removal of buildings and improvements, and site preparation and improvements, all as provided in paragraphs (1), (2), (3), (4), and (6) of section 110(c); and

"(ii) the payment of carrying charges related to the undertakings in clause (i) (including amounts in lieu of carrying charges as determined above), exclusive of taxes and payments in lieu of taxes but not beyond the point wher such a project is completed; but not the cost of any other undertakings and activities (including, but without being limited to, the cost of surveys and plans, legal services of any kind, and all administrative and overhead expenses of the local public agency) with respect to such project."

SEC. 312. Section 110(g) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended—

(1) by striking out of the first sentence "is approved" and inserting in lieu thereof "for any project under this title is authorized";

(2) by inserting in the second sentence after "Any" the word "such"; and

(3) by striking out of the second sentence "contract is revised or superseded by such later contract" and inserting in lieu thereof "later contract is authorized."

SEC. 313. The Housing Act of 1949 is amended—

(1) by striking out the word "capital" in section 100, the second sentence of section 103(b), and in sections 106(a)(3), 106(c)(6), 106(c)(8), and 106(e);

(2) by inserting in section 101(a) after the word "title" in the first place where it appears therein "or for grants pursuant to subsection (c) of section 103 hereof"; and

(3) by adding at the end of section 110 a new subsection as follows:

"(k) 'Federal recognition' means execution of any contract for financial assistance under this title or concurrence by the Administrator in the commencement, without such assistance, of surveys and plans."

SEC. 314. The requirement in section 110 (d) of the Housing Act of 1949 that the assistance given by a State, municipality, or other public body under that section shall be in condition with a project on which a contract for capital grant has been made under title I of that act shall not apply to assistance provided during the period from January 1, 1957, through December 31, 1958, in connection with (1) urban renewal activities which, at the time that the assistance was given, had not been extended recognition as a project to be assisted under that title solely because of then existing limitations on the authority of the Housing and Home Finance Administrator to make capital grants under that title or to reserve funds for such purpose, or (2) urban renewal activities which were extended such recognition within 60 days after the provision of such assistance was initiated.

SEC. 315. (a) Section 701 of the Housing Act of 1954 is amended by striking out in the first sentence the language after the parenthetical clause and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "to (1) cities and other municipalities having a population of less than 25,000 according to the latest decennial census, and (2) to any group of adjacent communities, either incorporated or unincorporated, having a total population of less than 25,000 according to the latest decennial census and having common or related urban planning problems resulting from rapid urbanization."

(b) Such section is further amended by striking out "$10,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$20,000,000."

TITLE IV. LOW-RENT HOUSING

SEC. 401. The first section of the United States Housing Act of 1937 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "In the development of public housing it shall be the policy to make adequate provision for larger families and for elderly families, and to acquire existing dwellings for public housing use when appropriate and economical. In the administration of public housing it shall be the policy to vest in local public agencies full responsibility for the establishment of rents and eligibility requirements (subject to income limit ceilings hereinafter provided), the preparation of budgets, the control of expenditures, and the provision of such social and recreational guidance as is necessary in assisting families to become good tenants and citizens of the larger community."

SEC. 402. (a) Paragraph (1) of section 2 of the United States Housing Act of 1937 is amended to read as follows:

"(1) The term 'low-rent housing' means decent, safe, and sanitary dwellings within the financial reach of families of low income, and developed and administered to promote serviceability, efficiency, economy, and stability, and embraces all necessary appurtenances thereto. The dwellings in low-rent housing shall be available solely for families of low income."

(b) Paragraph (7)(b) of section 15 of such act is amended to read as follows:

"(b) The Authority shall not make any contract for loans (other than preliminary loans) or for annual contributions pursuant to this Act with respect to any low-rent housing project initiated after March 1, 1949, unless the governing body of the locality involved has entered into an agreement with the public housing agency providing for the local cooperation required by the Authority pursuant to this Act."

(c) Paragraph (8)(a) of section 15 of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(a) the public housing agency shall fix maximum income limits for the admission and for the continued occupancy of families in such housing, and shall also fix the exemptions, if any, from net family income which shall be allowed in applying such income limits. In fixing income limits, the public housing agency shall determine (with the approval of the Authority), for dwellings of various sizes, the lowest annual rentals (or equivalent costs of owned homes), including the value or cost to the tenants of water, gas, other heating and cooking fuels, and other utilities, at which private enterprise unaided by public subsidy is providing (through new construction and available existing structures) a substantial supply of decent, safe, and sanitary housing toward meeting the need of an adequate volume thereof. The income limits fixed by the public housing agency for families of various sizes and compositions shall be such that (A) no family shall be eligible for admission whose net annual income, less exemptions, exceeds five times such lowest annual rental, less 20 per centum, of a dwelling of the size needed by such family, except that in the case of a family entitled to a first preference as provided in section 10(g) 20 per centum need not be deducted from such lowest annual rental; and (B) no family shall be eligible for continued occupancy whose net annual income, less exemptions, exceeds five times such lowest annual rental of a dwelling of the size needed by such family. In determining eligibility for admission the public housing agency may exempt not more than $600 of the income of each member of the family other than the principal income recipient and not more than the annual payments made by the U.S. Government to any member of the family for disability or death occurring in connection with military service; and in determining eligibility for continued occupancy the public housing agency may exempt (i) not more than the total annual income of minor members of the family, other than the principal income recipient and his spouse, (ii) not more than $600 of the income of any other member of the family, other than the principal income recipient, and (iii) not more than the annual payments made by the U.S. Government to any member of the family for disability or death occurring in connection with military service;".

(d) Paragraph (8)(b) of section 15 of such Act is amended by striking out clause (i) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "(i) had an income for eligibility not exceeding the maximum income limits fixed by the public housing agency;".

(e) Paragraph (8)(d) of section 15 of such Act is amended by striking out "(and approved by the Authority)".

SEC. 403. (a) Section 10(b) of the United States Housing Act of 1937 is amended to read as follows:

"(b) Annual contributions shall be strictly limited to the amounts necessary, in the determination of the Authority, to assure the repayment of all sums borrowed by the public housing agency to finance the development or acquisition cost of a project together with the interest, as contracted for from time to time, on the sums so borrowed; except that the fixed contribution payable annually under any contract shall in no event exceed a sum equal to the annual yield, at the applicable going Federal rate plus 2 percent, upon the development or acquisition cost of the low-rent housing or slum clearance project involved. The contract for annual contributions shall provide for their payment over a fixed period of years, to be determined by the Authority, which shall in no event exceed 40 years from the date the first annual contribution for the project is paid. When payment of all sums borrowed (or provisions for such payment) has been made, annual contributions shall cease."

(b) Section 10 (c) of such act is amended to read as follows:

"(c) Every contract for annual contributions shall provide that whenever in any year the receipts of a public housing agency in connection with a low-rent housing project exceed its expenditures (including debt service, administration, maintenance, establishment of reserves, and other costs and charges), an amount equal to such excess shall be divided (i) one-third to the public housing agency solely for low-rent housing use, which use shall be reported by the public housing agency in its annual certification to the Authority pursuant to this subsection, and (ii) two-thirds for repayment of outstanding development or acquisition loans in connection with the project either through immediate repayment or establishment of a sinking fund. Every contract for annual contributions shall require that the public housing agency and its chairman shall annually, after an independent audit made by and certified to by the State auditor or other appropriate State official or by a public accountant of recognized standing of the books and accounts of the public housing agency, transmit a copy of such audit and certify to the Authority that the agency has complied with the provisions of this act and that the financial statements are true and correct. Such certification shall, in the absence of fraud or of evidence of waste or neglect, or expenditures which are not reasonably compatible with the operation of low-rent public housing, or extravagance, disclosed by financial post-audits pursuant to sections 814 and 816 of the Housing Act of 1954, and in the absence of evidence of violation of the provisions of this act, be accepted as final and conclusive by all officers of the Federal Government: Provided, That no provision of this section limits or reduces the authority of the General Accounting Office to audit expenditures under this act."

SEC. 404. Section 10(i) of the U.S. Housing Act of 1937 is amended—

(2) by striking out the first proviso and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That the authority to enter into new contracts for annual contributions with respect to each such 35,000, or 17,500, additional dwelling units, as the case may be, shall terminate 4 years after the first date on which such authority may be exercised under the foregoing provisions of this subsection:".

SEC. 405. (a) The U.S. Housing Act of 1937 is amended by inserting after section 29 a new section as follows:

"SEC. 30. Upon the request of any local public agency the Authority is authorized and directed to amend any or all of its contracts with the local public agency so as to bring such contracts into conformity with the provisions of this Act in effect on the date of such request: Provided, That contracts may not be amended or superseded in a manner which would impair the rights of the holders of any outstanding obligations of the public housing agency involved which are secured by any of the provisions of such contracts."

(b) Sections 30 and 31 of such act, as they existed prior to the amendment made in subsection (a) of this section, are redesignated as sections 31 and 32, respectively.

SEC. 406. Section 107 of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 107. When it appears in the public interest that an urban renewal project area should be used in whole or in part as a site for a low-rent housing project assisted under the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, the site shall be made available to the local housing agency undertaking the housing project at a price equal to the amount, as determined by the Administrator, which would be charged if it were disposed of to private enterprise for lowest rental housing, and such amount shall be included as part of the development cost of the low-rent housing project: Provided, That the local contribution in the form of tax exemption or tax remission required by section 10(h) of the said act with respect to the low-rent housing project into which such land is incorporated shall (if covered by a contract which, in the determination of the Public Housing Commissioner, and without regard to the requirements of the first proviso of said section 10(h), will assure that such local contribution will be made during the entire period that the project is used as low-rent housing within the meaning of the said act) be accepted as a local grant-in-aid equal in amount, as determined by the Administrator, to one-half (or one-third in the case of a project on a three-fourths capital grant basis) of the difference between the cost of such land (including costs of clearance if any) and its sales price, and shall be considered a local grant-in-aid furnished in a form other than cash within the meaning of section 110(e) of this title."

SEC. 501. Section 401(d) of the Housing Act of 1950 is amended to read as follows:

"(d) To obtain funds for loans under this title, the Administrator may issue and have outstanding at any one time notes and obligations for purchase by the Secretary of the Treasury in an amount not to exceed $1,325 million: Provided, That the amount outstanding for other educational facilities, as defined herein, shall not exceed $150 million: Provided further, That the amount outstanding for hospitals, referred to in clause (2) of section 404(b) of this title, shall not exceed $75 million."

SEC. 502. (a) Title IV of the Housing Act of 1950 is amended by adding at the end thereof new sections as follows:

"Loans for classroom buildings and other academic facilities

"SEC. 405. (a) In addition to the other purposes for which financial assistance may be extended under this title, the Administrator may make loans to educational institutions for (1) the construction of new structures suitable for use as classrooms, laboratories, and related facilities (including initial equipment, machinery, and utilities) necessary or appropriate for the instruction of students or the administration of the institution, and (2) the rehabilitation, alteration, conversion, or improvement of existing structures for the uses described above if such structures are otherwise inadequate for such uses. As used in this section, the term 'educational institution' means any educational institution offering at least a 2-year program acceptable for full credit toward a baccalaureate degree, including any public educational institution, or any private educational institution no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any private shareholder or individual.

"(b) Any educational institution which, prior to the effective date of this section, has contracted for the construction, rehabilitation, alteration, conversion, or improvement of any structures for the uses described in subsection (a) above may, in connection therewith, receive loans authorized by this section, as the Administrator may determine, but no such loan shall be made in connection with the construction, rehabilitation, alteration, conversion, or improvement of any such structure if the work thereon was commenced prior to the effective date of this section, or was completed prior to the filing of an application under this section.

"SEC. 406. (a) In addition to his other authority under this title, the Administrator may enter into a contract, to be known as a debt service guaranty contract, pursuant to which the Administrator may guarantee the payment of the principal of and interest on the bonds of an educational institution, if the bonds are to be issued and sold to investors other than the United States in financing (1) the construction of new structures suitable for use as classrooms, laboratories, and related facilities (including the initial equipment, machinery, and utilities) necessary or appropriate for the instruction of students or the administration of the institution, and (2) the rehabilitation, alteration, conversion, or improvement of existing structures for the uses described above if such structures are otherwise inadequate for such uses: Provided, That no application for a loan under section 405 of this title service be denied approval because a debt service guaranty contract may be available to the applicant. The debt service guaranty contract shall obligate the Administrator, so long as such bonds are outstanding, to pay to a trustee under an indenture securing the bonds, such amounts which, when added to the moneys available from the revenues or funds pledged by such institution as security for the bonds (including all reserve funds therefor), may be needed to make the payments due on the bonds. The aggregate principal amount of such guaranteed bonds outstanding at any one time shall not exceed $250 million.

"(b) (1) For the purposes of this section the Administrator is authorized to establish a fund to be known as the College Housing Guaranty Fund.

"(2) All fees received in connection with guaranties issued under this section, all funds borrowed from the Secretary of the Treasury pursuant to subsection (d), all earnings on the assets of the College Housing Guaranty Fund, all appropriations for carrying out functions under this section, and all other receipts of the Administrator in connection with the performance of his functions under this section shall be deposited in the Fund. All payments to trustees under subsection (a), repayments to the Secretary of the Treasury of sums borrowed from him pursuant to subsection (d), and all administrative expenses and any other expenses of the Administrator in connection with the performance of his functions under this section shall be paid from the College Housing Guaranty Fund. Moneys in the Fund may be invested in obligations of the United States, or in obligations guaranteed as to principal and interest by the United States, or in obligations eligible for investment of public funds. Such obligations may be sold and the proceeds derived therefrom may be reinvested, as herein provided, if deemed advisable by the Administrator. Income from such investment or reinvestment shall be deposited in the Fund.

"(c) The Administrator is authorized to charge and collect a fee, as a consideration for the Government's guaranty of the loan, to cover administrative and other expenses in carrying out his functions under this section and to establish a reserve for losses. Such fee may be included in the amount of the bonds guaranteed.

"(d) To carry out the purpose of this section the Administrator is authorized to issue to the Secretary of the Treasury from time to time notes or other obligations for purchase by the Secretary of the Treasury in amounts sufficient, together with any funds in the College Housing Guaranty Fund, to make payments of principal and interest on all bonds guaranteed under this section in accordance with the Debt Service Guaranty Contract. In the issuance of such notes or other obligations, the Administrator and the Secretary of the Treasury shall be governed by the provisions of, and exercise the authorities granted them respectively by section 401 (e), it being the intention hereof to make the provisions and authorities of said section 401(c) applicable to the notes and other obligations authorized and issued pursuant to this section.

"(e) The provisions of paragraph (b) of section 402 shall be inapplicable to funds made available to the Administrator in carrying out his functions under this section."

(b) Title IV of such act is further amended by—

(1) striking out "Housing" in the heading of such title and inserting in lieu thereof "Loans";

(2) striking out "Federal" in the heading of section 401 and inserting in lieu thereof "College Housing";

(3) inserting after "loan" in clause (1) of the first proviso to section 401(a) the following: "(including any loan under sec. 405 of this title)";

(4) striking out "A loan to an educational institution may be in an amount not exceeding the total development cost of the facility, as determined by the Administrator" in section 401(c) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "A loan under this section to an educational institution may be in an amount not exceeding the total development cost of the facility, as determined by the Administrator, and a loan under section 405 of this title to an educational institution may be in an amount not exceeding the cost of construction of the structures involved (including related facilities), and the land on which the structures are located, as determined by the Administrator";

(5) inserting "(1)" immediately before the text of subsection (d) of section 401, by striking out "under this title" in such subsection (d) and inserting in lieu thereof "under subsection (a) of this section," and by adding at the end of such subsection (d) a new paragraph as follows:

"(2) In addition to the notes and other obligations authorized in paragraph (1) of this subsection, the Administrator may issue to the Secretary, from time to time and have outstanding at any one time, in an amount not exceeding $125 million, notes and other obligations for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of section 405 of this title.";

(6) striking out section 401(f) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(f) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Administrator such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this title."

(7) inserting before the semicolon in section 402(c)(2) a colon and the following: "Provided, That the Administrator shall extend financial assistance to educational institutions under section 405 only after consultation with, and in accordance with the advice and recommendations of, said Office of Education."

(8) inserting "or guaranteed" after "made" in the first sentence of paragraph (4) of section 402 (c);

(9) adding the following new subsection at the end of section 402:

"(e) The provisions of section 309 of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1950 (Public Law 81–266; 63 Stat. 662), which are applicable to corporations or agencies subject to the Government Corporation Control Act, shall also be applicable to the activities of the Administrator under this title.";

(10) inserting after "For the purposes of this title," in section 404 the following: "except as otherwise provided in section 405,".

(11) adding a new subsection at the end of section 404 as follows:

"(i) 'Bonds' mean any bonds, notes, interim certificates, certificates of indebtedness, debentures, or other obligations."

SEC. 601. (a) Section 803(a) of the National Housing Act is amended by striking out "June 30, 1959" and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1960."

(b) The second sentence of paragraph 3 of section 803(b) of such act is amended by striking out "25" and inserting in lieu thereof "30."

SEC. 602. (a) Title VIII of the National Housing Act is amended by adding at the end thereof a new section as follows:

"SEC. 810. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, the Commissioner may insure and make commitments to insure any mortgage under this section which meets the eligibility requirements hereinafter set forth.

"(b) No mortgage shall be insured under this section unless the Secretary of Defense or his designee shall have certified to the Commissioner that (1) the housing which is covered by the insured mortgage is necessary in the interest of national defense in order to provide adequate housing for military personnel and essential civilian personnel serving or employed in connection with an installation of one of the armed services of the United States, (2) there is no present intention to curtail substantially the number of such personnel assigned or to be assigned to the installation, (3) adequate housing is not available for such personnel at reasonable rentals within reasonable commuting distance of such installation, and (4) the mortgaged property will not so far as can be reasonably foreseen substantially curtail occupancy in any existing housing in the vicinity of the installation if such housing is covered by mortgages insured under this act. Any such certificate issued by the Secretary of Defense or his designee shall be conclusive evidence to the Commissioner of the eligibility of the mortgage for insurance in accordance with the requirements of this subsection.

"(c) The Commissioner may accept any mortgage for insurance under this section without regard to any requirement in any other section of this act that the property or project be economically sound.

"(d) The Commissioner shall require each project covered by a mortgage insured under this section to be held for rental for a period of not less than 5 years after the project or dwelling is made available for initial occupancy or until advised by the Secretary of Defense or his designee that the housing may be released from such rental condition. Priority in the sale or rental of dwellings covered by a mortgage insured under this section shall be required and given to military personnel and essential civilian employees of the armed services, and employees of contractors for the armed services, as evidenced by certification issued by the Secretary of Defense or his designee. Such certificate shall be conclusive evidence to the Commissioner of the employment status of the person requiring housing and of such person's need for the housing.

"(e) For the purpose of providing multifamily rental housing projects or housing projects consisting of individual single family dwellings for sale, the Commissioner is authorized to insure mortgages (including advances on such mortgages during construction) which cover property held by (1) Federal or State instrumentalities, municipal corporate instrumentalities of one or more States, or limited dividend or redevelopment or housing corporations restricted by Federal or State laws or regulations of State banking or insurance departments as to rents, charges, capital structure, rate of return or methods of operation, or (2) private corporations, associations, cooperative societies, or trusts. Any such mortgagor shall possess powers necessary therefor and incidental thereto and shall until the termination of all obligations of the Commissioner under such insurance be regulated or restricted as to rents or sales, charges, capital structure, rate of return, and methods of operation to such extent and in such manner as to provide reasonable rentals to tenants and a reasonable return on the investment. The Commissioner may make such contracts with, and acquire for not to exceed $100 such stock or interest in, any such corporation, association, cooperative society, or trust as he may deem necessary to render effective such restriction or regulation. Such stock or interest shall be paid for out of the Armed Services Housing Mortgage Insurance Fund, and shall be redeemed by the corporation, association, cooperative society, or trust at par upon the termination of all obligations of the Commissioner under the insurance.

"(f) To be eligible for insurance under this section, a mortgage of any multifamily rental property or project shall involve a principal obligation in an amount (1) not to exceed $12,500,000 or, if executed by a mortgagor coming within the provisions of subsection (e)(1) of this section, not to exceed $50 million, or (2) not to exceed, for such part of such property or project as may be attributable to dwelling use, $2,500 per room (or $9,000 per family unit if the number of rooms in such property or project is less than four per family unit), and not to exceed 90 per centum of the estimated value of the property or project when the proposed physical improvements are completed: Provided, That as to projects which consist of elevator-type structures and to compensate for the higher costs incident to the construction of elevator-type structures of sound standards of construction and design, the Commissioner may, in his discretion, increase the aforesaid dollar amount limitations per room or per family unit (as may be applicable to the particular case) within the following limits: (i) $2,500 per room to not to exceed $3,000; (ii) $9,000 per family unit to not to exceed $9,400; except that the Commissioner may, by regulation, increase any of the foregoing dollar amount limitations per room contained in this paragraph by not to exceed $1,000 per room in any geographical area where he finds that cost levels so require.

"(g) To be eligible for insurance under this section, a mortgage on any property or project constructed for eventual sale of single family dwellings shall involve a principal obligation in an amount not to exceed $12,500,000 and not to exceed a sum computed on the basis of a separate mortgage for each single family dwelling (irrespective of whether such dwelling has a party wall or is otherwise physically connected with another dwelling or dwellings) comprising the property or project equal to the total of each of the maximum principal obligations of such mortgages which would meet the requirements of section 203(b)(2) of this Act, if the mortgagor were the owner and occupant who had made the required payment on account of the property prescribed in such paragraph.

"(h) Any mortgage insured under this section shall provide for complete amortization by periodic payments within such terms as the Commissioner may prescribe but not to exceed the maximum term applicable to mortgages under section 207 of this Act and shall bear interest (exclusive of premium charges for insurance) at not to exceed the rate applicable to mortgages insured under section 207, except that individual mortgages of the character described in subsection (g) covering the individual dwellings in the project may have a term not in excess of the maximum term applicable to mortgages insured under section 203 of this Act or the unexpired term of the project mortgage at the time of the release of the mortgaged property from such project mortgage, whichever is the greater, and shall bear interest at not to exceed the rate applicable to mortgages insured under section 203. The Commissioner may consent to the release of a part or parts of the mortgaged property from the lien of the mortgage upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe and the mortgage may provide for such release, and a mortgage of the character described in subsection (g) of this section may provide that, at any time after the release of the project from the rental period prescribed by subsection (d), such mortgage may be replaced, in whole or in part, by individual mortgages covering each individual dwelling in the project in amounts not to exceed the unpaid balance of the blanket mortgage allocable to the individual property. Each such individual mortgage may be insured under this section. Property covered by a mortgage insured under this section may include eight or more family units and may include such commercial and community facilities as the Commissioner deems adequate to serve the occupants.

"(i) The provisions of subsections (d), (e), (g), (h), (i), (j), (k), (l), (m), (n), and (p) of section 207 of this title shall be applicable to mortgages insured under this section except individual mortgages of the character described in subsection (g) of this section covering the individual dwellings in the project, and as to such individual mortgages the provisions of subsections (a), (c), (d), (e), (f), (g), (h), and (j) of section

204 shall be applicable: Provided, That wherever the words 'Fund,' 'Mutual Mortgage Insurance Fund,' or 'Housing Insurance Fund' appear in section 204 or 207, all such references shall refer to the Armed Services Housing Mortgage Insurance Fund with respect to mortgages insured under this section.

"(j) The provisions of sections 801, 802, 803(c), 803(i), 803(j), 804(a), 804(b), and 807 and the provisions of section 803(a) relating to the aggregate amount of all mortgages insured and the expiration date of the Commissioner's authority to insure under this title shall be applicable to mortgages insured under this section.

"(k) If the Commissioner determines that insurance of mortgages on any housing of the type described in this section is not an acceptable risk, he may require the Secretary of Defense to guarantee the Armed Services Housing Mortgage Insurance Fund from loss with respect to mortgages insured pursuant to this section. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to provide for payment to meet losses arising from such guaranty."

(b) Section 808 of such act is amended by striking out "The" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Except in the case of mortgages on multifamily rental housing projects insured under section 810, the".

(c) Section 212(a) of such act is amended by striking out "or under title VIII" and inserting in lieu thereof "or under section 803 or 810 of title VIII".

(d) Section 305(f) of such act is amended by inserting "or 810" after "809".

SEC. 603. (a) The first sentence of section 404(a) of the Housing Amendments of 1955 is amended to read as follows: "Whenever the Secretary of Defense or his designee deems it necessary for the purpose of this title, he may acquire by purchase, donation, condemnation, or other means of transfer, any land or (with the approval of the Federal Housing Commissioner) (1) any housing financed with mortgages insured under title VIII of the National Housing Act as in effect prior to August 11, 1955, or (2) any housing situated adjacent to a military installation which was (A) completed prior to July 1, 1952; (B) certified by the Department of Defense, prior to construction, as being necessary to meet an existing military family housing need and considered as military housing by the Federal Housing Commissioner, and (C) financed with mortgages insured under section 207 of the National Housing Act."

(c) Section 407(f) of the act entitled "An act to authorize certain construction at military installations, and for other purposes", approved August 30, 1957, is amended to read as follows:

"(f) This section shall have no application to any housing described in clause (1) or (2) of section 404(a) of the Housing Amendments of 1955, as amended."

SEC. 604. (a) Section 404(c) of the Housing Amendments of 1955 is amended to read as follows:

"(c) (1) Condemnation proceedings instituted pursuant to this section shall be conducted in accordance with the provisions of the act of August 1, 1888 (25 Stat. 357; 40 U.S.C. 257), as amended, or any other applicable Federal statute. Before any such condemnation proceedings are instituted, an effort shall be made to acquire the property involved by negotiation. In any such condemnation proceedings, and in the interests of expedition, the issue of just compensation shall be determined by a commission of three persons to be appointed by the court. One of the persons so appointed shall be selected from a panel of qualified, disinterested persons submitted by the Secretary of Defense, or his designee, and one of the persons so appointed shall be selected from a panel of qualified, disinterested persons submitted by the owner of the property with respect to which the proceedings are instituted. Any commission appointed hereunder shall give full consideration to replacement costs and fair depreciation, and shall have the powers of a master provided in subdivision (c) of Rule 53 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and proceedings before it shall be governed by the provisions of paragraphs (1) and (2) of subdivision (d) of such rule. Its action and report shall be determined by a majority and its findings and report shall have the effect, and be dealt with by the court in accordance with the practice prescribed in paragraph (2) of subdivision (e) of such rule. Trial of all issues, other than just compensation, shall be by the court.

"(2) In any condemnation proceedings instituted pursuant to this section, the court shall not order the party in possession to surrender possession in advance of final judgment unless a declaration of taking has been filed, and a deposit of the amount estimated to be just compensation has been made, under the first section of the act of February 26, 1931 (46 Stat. 1421), providing for such declarations. Unless title is in dispute, the court, upon application, shall promptly pay to the owner at least 75 percent of the amount so deposited, but such payment shall be made without prejudice to any party to the proceeding. In the event that condemnation proceedings are instituted in accordance with procedures under such act of February 26, 1931, the court shall order that the amount deposited shall be paid in a lump sum or over a period not exceeding 5 years in accordance with stipulations executed by the parties in the proceedings. In connection with condemnation proceedings which do not utilize the procedures under such act, the Secretary or his designee, after final judgment of the court, may pay or agree to pay in a lump sum or, in accordance with stipulations executed by the parties to the proceedings, over a period not exceeding 5 years the difference between the outstanding principal obligation, plus accrued interest, and the price for the property fixed by the court. Unless such payment is made in a lump sum, the unpaid balance thereof shall bear interest at the rate of 4 percent per annum."

(b) The amendment made by this section shall be applicable to any condemnation proceedings instituted pursuant to section 404 of the Housing Amendments of 1955 in which a final adjudication of just compensation has not been made on the date of enactment of this act.

Federal National Mortgage Association

SEC. 701 (a) Section 302(b) of the National Housing Act is amended by adding the following before the period: ", except that with respect to mortgages purchased under section 304 the principal obligation shall not exceed $20,000."

(b) The second sentence of section 305(b) of such act is amended by striking out "1958" and inserting in lieu thereof "1960."

SEC. 702. Section 603(c) of the Housing Act of 1957 is amended to read as follows:

"(c) The authority of the Housing and Home Finance Agency to make grants under subsection (b) shall expire June 30, 1962. The total amount of such grants shall not exceed $300,000 during each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1958, and June 30, 1959, and shall not exceed $100,000 during each of the fiscal years beginning July 1, 1959, and ending June 30, 1962."

SEC. 703. Section 702 of the Housing Act of 1954 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(f) The Administrator is authorized to use during any fiscal year not to exceed $50,000 of the moneys in the revolving fund (established under subsection (e)) to conduct surveys of the status and current volume of State and local public works planning and surveys of estimated requirements for State and local public works: Provided, That the Administrator, in conducting any such survey, may utilize or act through any Federal department or agency with its consent."

SEC. 704. (a) Section 500(d) of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 is amended by inserting before the period at the end of the first sentence a comma and the following: "or (3) by any Federal Housing Administration approved mortgagee designated by the Federal Housing Commissioner as a certified agent and which is acceptable to the Administrator."

(b)(1) Section 504(c) of such act is amended by adding at the end thereof a new sentence as follows: "The Administrator may also refuse to appraise any dwelling or housing project owned, sponsored, or to be constructed by any person refused the benefits of participation under the National Housing Act pursuant to a determination of the Federal Housing Commissioner under section 512 of that act."

(2) Section 514 of such act is amended by adding at the end thereof a new sentence as follows: "The Administrator may also refuse either temporarily or permanently to guarantee or insure any loans made by a lender or holder refused the benefits of participation under the National Housing Act pursuant to a determination of the Federal Housing Commissioner under section 512 of that act."

(c) Section 513(d) of such act is amended by adding at the end of the first sentence a new sentence as follows:

"In addition, the Secretary shall make available to the Administrator such additional sums not in excess of $300 million as the Administrator may request."

Disposal of Projects

SEC. 705. (a) Section 607 of the act of October 14, 1940, as amended (42 U.S.C. 1587), is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection as follows:

"(h) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Administrator may, whenever he deems it desirable, in the public interest, and in the fulfillment of the purposes of this title, consent to the modification, with respect to purchase price, repayment period, rate of interest, time of payment of any installment on principal or interest, security, or any other term, of any contract, sale, mortgage, or other agreement to which he is a party, or which has been transferred to him pursuant to this title: Provided, That, in any such modification of a contract, sale, mortgage, or other agreement relating to housing projects heretofore disposed of as a whole or in other portions, exceeding four family dwelling units per portion, under paragraph (c) of this section by sale to a group organized on a mutual or cooperative basis, the Administrator shall endeavor to make such modifications as may be necessary to enable such group to retain possession, wherever this result can be achieved without undue sacrifice of the interest of the Federal Government."

(b) The use of projects PA-36011 and PA-36012 (which were conveyed to the Housing Authority of Philadelphia, Pa., under section 406(c) of the Housing Act of 1956) for the housing of military personnel and civilians employed in defense activities without regard to their income and the giving of a preference in respect to 700 dwelling units in such projects for such military personnel as the Secretary of Defense or his designee prescribes for a period of 5 years after the date of the conveyance is hereby authorized. Such use and the giving of such preferences shall not deprive the housing projects of their status as "low-rent housing" as that term is used and defined in the United States Housing Act of 1937 and within the meaning of that term as used in section 606(b) of an act entitled "An act to expedite the provision of housing in connection with national defense, and for other purposes, approved October 14, 1940, as amended. The Housing and Home Finance Administrator is authorized and directed to agree to any amendments to the instruments of conveyance required to give effect to the purposes of this act.

SEC. 706. Section 610(a) of the Housing Act of 1954 is amended by striking out "1959" and inserting in lieu thereof "1960."

AMENDMENT OF AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 1938, RELATING TO LEASE AND TRANSFER OF ACREAGE ALLOTMENTS

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and my colleague, the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, to provide for lease and transfer of acreage allotments. I ask unanimous consent that an explanation of the bill, prepared by me, may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the explanation will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 58) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, to provide for lease and transfer of acreage allotments, introduced by Mr. SPARKMAN (for himself and Mr. HILL), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The explanation presented by Mr. SPARKMAN is as follows:

EXPLANATION OF BILL

The bill, as proposed, provides that a farmer may lease any commodity acreage allotment established for his farm to another farmer in the same county and the acreage so leased shall be transferred to the farm of the lessee for one year. The terms and conditions of the lease shall be those agreed to by the farmers concerned.

This legislation will be helpful to a farmer who does not desire to grow the crop for which an allotment is made for his farm since he will be able to realize some income by leasing the allotment to other farmers. This is a significant consideration in view of the fact that such a farmer will most likely not be able to supplement his income in 1959 through the acreage-reserve provisions of the soil bank. It will be helpful also to a farmer who needs an increase in acreage allotment in order to be able to devote an entire field to an allotment crop. For example, a farmer with a 10-acre cotton allotment may have one field containing 12 acres. If he could lease two acres from a neighbor and transfer such acreage to his farm, he would then be in position to plant the entire field to the crop. There are also other advantages.

The bill provides that the ASC county committees would maintain control of the lease and transfer of allotments. No lease would be effective until a copy thereof is filed with and approved by the county committee. The county committee would also maintain control with respect to the problem of transferring acreage allotments from low-producing farms to farms with a higher productivity index.

The lease and transfer of allotment acreage under provisions of this bill would not adversely affect the determination of future State, county, or farm allotments since the acreage leased would be considered as devoted to the crop on the farm of the lessor.

TAX ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM FOR SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a tax bill, the purpose of which is to help make it possible for millions of small businessmen to stay in business.

It is one of the facts of economic life today that a business enterprise must grow and expand in step with our expanding economy. Survival often depends on the ability of a small concern to match, at least on a relative basis, the tremendous strides of their larger competitors. To stand still is to invite disaster.

Several factors make it extremely difficult for many small businessmen to find the money needed to finance the growth of their companies. One of these factors is the deep bite which Federal income taxes take out of their often slender earnings. Another is the difficulty small businessmen encounter in trying to borrow funds for needed improvements in their factories and in the stores which line the main streets of America.

The purpose of my bill is to provide at least a partial solution for these drawbacks by permitting a tax deduction on small business earnings which are plowed back into the business. This is not a complex piece of tax legislation. It simply provides for a deduction from taxable income of either $30,000 or 20 percent, whichever is the lesser, of net income which is reinvested in the business.

I am certain, Mr. President, that this proposal to help preserve literally hundreds of thousands of small concerns will receive sympathetic consideration by many Members of the Senate. Few there are indeed who are not aware of the high rate of small business failures in recent years compared with the tremendous growth of the Nation's largest corporations. The trend is fully in evidence. It would be folly to ignore it.

Last year I introduced an omnibus small business tax adjustment bill which contained a reinvestment provision. Fifty Senators cosponsored this bill. For that reason, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my present bill lie on the table for 1 week.

The bill that I offer today provides for somewhat more extensive tax assistance to promote the growth of small concerns than did the reinvestment provision of the tax bill I introduced during the 85th Congress. This reflects my increasing concern that unless our Government is willing to extend this type of help to small business concerns, we may with unhappy assurance witness within the next few years a disastrous deterioration in the position small business will come to occupy in our national economy.

It affords me encouragement to state that in the House, Congressmen FRANK IKARD and TOM CURTIS are sponsoring a bill to give small business the benefits of a reinvestment deduction.

Later in the session, Mr. President, I shall introduce additional bills which, in my opinion, would provide small businessmen the kind of tax relief which is essential for their economic well-being.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 59) to provide a program of tax adjustment for small business and for persons engaged in small business, introduced by Mr. SPARKMAN (for himself, Mr. HUMPHREY, and Mr. KEFAUVER), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

AMENDMENT OF AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 1938, RELATING TO PRESERVATION OF ACREAGE ALLOTMENT HISTORY OF FARMS

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, over the years I have been very much concerned over the loss of cotton acreage to farmers and counties resulting from under planting allotments. The national allotment has already been cut much below an economical level and further reductions permitted, due to under planting of acreage, would cause undue hardships on cotton farmers and the local economy.

The Congress recognized this critical problem in 1957 when it adopted an amendment to automatically preserve farm allotments for cotton and other basic crops for the years 1957, 1958, and 1959. This provision will expire at the end of the current crop year and unless extended many farm and county allotments will be unfairly reduced because of circumstances beyond their control.

Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and my colleague, the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill which would make permanent the provisions in present law which would preserve acreage history credits for the full allotment regardless of whether it was planted. This provision, which has been in effect since 1957, has been most successful in bringing about stability in cotton acreage and has been less costly to administer. Acreage allotments, county by county and farm by farm, are based on statutory formula involving the acreage planted over a period of years. When allowable acreage is underplanted and necessary legal precaution not taken to preserve history credits, allowable acreage not only on farms but within the county is proportionately diminished in the future.

Prior to the automatic protection of acreage history, many inequitable acreage shifts at the farm and county levels were experienced. Farmers in most cases felt it necessary to plant their full allotment in order to protect their history and thereby contributed to building up surpluses. If the automatic provision is not extended, farmers can preserve their allotments only by planting 90 percent of their allotment or by releasing their allotment to the county committee for reapportionment to other farmers. These procedures are not understood by many farmers, and as a result underplanting of allotment will cause counties to lose acreage and thereby penalize other farmers in the county.

Because of the lack of understanding of these legal requirements and complicated change in the law from year to year, many of our farmers will lose cotton acreage. Administration of exemptions is a burden on the county committee and other agricultural workers. It is also a burden on the individual farmer who is keenly interested in preserving his history. Unless this amendment is extended, farmers will be required to come to the county office on their own time and own expense to execute the required documents to preserve history prior to planting time.

Mr. President, I believe that the primary purpose of the exemption provided by law can be more easily accomplished both for the Government and the farmer by continuing on a permanent basis the provisions which automatically compute acreage history regardless of whether farm allotments have been fully planted. This feature has worked exceptionally well for the past 2 years, and the bill which I have introduced would extend this provision on a permanent basis and as provided in present law would cover all basic crops. The undesirable results from underplanting would be removed as an obstacle to effective operations of the programs at the farm and county level. This would continue to result in great savings to the Government at an estimated $1 million annually in administrative expenses. I hope that the Agriculture Committee will give special attention to this proposed legislation and report it to the Senate at the earliest possible date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 62) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, relating to the preservation of acreage allotment history of farms, introduced by Mr. STENNIS, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

CONTROL OF EXCESSIVE CONSUMERS' INSTALLMENT CREDIT

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize the Federal Reserve Board to impose controls over installment credit in connection with the sale of consumers' durable goods, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

In seeking methods of keeping inflation under control, the Congress should consider the advisability of giving the Federal Reserve Board standby powers to control the excessive use of consumers' installment credit. The bill I am introducing is intended to raise this issue before the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I am hopeful that early hearings will be scheduled.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD, following these remarks, together with an address entitled "Consumer Credit—a Rose or Thorn," delivered by C. Conley Balderston, vice chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve Board, on October 23, 1958.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and address will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 63) to authorize the Federal Reserve Board to impose controls over installment credit in connection with sales of consumers' durable goods, introduced by Mr. BUSH, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it is the policy of the Federal Government, as declared in the Employment Act of 1946, to promote maximum employment, production, and purchasing power. In order to accomplish these objectives in a significant fashion, they must be brought about in an economy in which the general level of prices is relatively stable. One of the principal factors leading to increases in the general level of prices which can interfere with the meaningful attainment of the objectives of the Employment Act of 1946 is the excessive use of installment credit in connection with the purchase of consumers' durable goods. It is the purpose of this act to provide authority for the control of such credit, in order to prevent such excessive use thereof as may threaten the stability of the general level of prices and the effective attainment of the goals of maximum employment, production, and purchasing power.

SEC. 2. (a) In order to assist in carrying out the objectives of this Act, the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System is authorized to regulate and control installment credit in connection with the purchase of consumers' durable goods, and for that purpose the Board may make such rules, regulations, and orders as it may deem necessary and appropriate.

(b) Any regulation or order under this Act may be established in such form and manner, may contain such classifications and differentiations, and may provide for such adjustments and exceptions as in the judgment of the Board of Governors are necessary or proper to effectuate the purposes of this Act or to prevent circumvention or evasion, or to facilitate enforcement of this Act, or any rule, regulation, or order issued under this Act. Such regulations may, among other things, prescribe maximum loan or credit values, minimum downpayments in cash or property, trade-in or exchange values, maximum maturities, aggregate amounts of credit extended by or to any person, rules regarding the amount, form, and time of various payments, rules against credit in specified circumstances, rules regarding consolidations, renewals, revisions, transfers, pledges, or assignments of credit, and rules regarding other similar or related matters.

(c) In prescribing or suspending such regulations, including making changes from time to time to take account of changing conditions, the Board of Governors shall consider, among such other factors as the Board may deem appropriate, the general credit situation and the need in the public interest for preventing or reducing excessive or untimely use of or fluctuations in various kinds of credit.

SEC. 3. No person (whether acting as principal, agent, broker, vendor, or otherwise and whether or not in connection with the selling of consumer durable goods or any other business) shall extend or maintain any installment credit in connection with the purchase of consumers' durable goods, or renew, revise, consolidate, refinance, purchase, sell, discount, or lend or borrow on, any obligation arising out of any such credit, or arrange for any of the foregoing, in contravention of any regulation prescribed by the Board of Governors pursuant to this Act.

SEC. 4. Any person who extends or maintains any installment credit in connection with the purchase of consumers' durable goods, or renews, revises, consolidates, refinances, purchases, sells, discounts, or lends or borrows on, any obligation arising out of any such credit, or arranges for any of the foregoing, shall make, keep, and preserve for such periods, such accounts, correspondence, memorandums, papers, books, and other records, and make such reports, under oath or otherwise, as the Board of Governors may by regulation require as necessary or appropriate in order to effectuate the purposes of this Act; and such accounts, correspondence, memorandums, papers, books, and all other records shall be subject at any time to such reasonable periodic or other examinations as the Board may deem necessary or appropriate in order to effectuate the purposes of this Act.

SEC. 5. All the present provisions of sections 21 and 27 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, as amended (relating to investigations, injunctions, jurisdictions, subpenas, and related matters), shall be as fully applicable with respect to the exercise by the Board of Governors of functions under this Act as they are now applicable with respect to the exercise by the Securities and Exchange Commission of its functions under that Act, and the Board shall have the same powers in the exercise of the functions conferred by this Act as the Commission now has under sections 21 and 27 of that Act. The Board by regulation may require transactions or persons or classes thereof subject to this Act to be registered and, after notice and opportunity for hearing, the Board by order may suspend any such registration for violation of this Act or any regulations prescribed by the Board pursuant to this Act. The provisions of section 25 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, as amended, shall apply in the case of any such order of the Board in the same manner as such provisions apply in the case of orders of the Securities and Exchange Commission under that Act. In administering this Act, the Board may utilize the services of the Federal Reserve banks and any other agencies, Federal or State, which are available and appropriate.

SEC. 6. For the purposes of this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the following terms shall have the following meanings:

(1) "Installment credit" means credit which is for the purpose of purchasing, carrying, or financing, or involves a right to acquire or use, any consumers' durable goods for personal, family, or household purposes other than the construction or purchase of a residential building; if the credit is extended in consideration of regular partial repayments over an extended period; or any closely related form of credit deemed by the Board of Governors to be necessary for inclusion as installment credit in order to effectuate the purposes of this Act or to prevent evasions thereof. "Consumers' durable goods" means any article or commodity which is durable or semidurable and is used or usable for personal, family, or household purposes, and any services, benefits, or materials connected with the acquisition of any such article or commodity or any interest therein.

(2) "Credit" means any loan, mortgage, deed of trust, advance, or discount; any conditional sale contract; any contract to sell or sale or contract of sale, of property or services, either for present or future delivery, under which part or all of the price is payable subsequent to the making of such sale or contract; any rental-purchase contract; any contract or arrangement for the hire, bailment, or leasing of property; any option, demand, lien, pledge, or other claim against, or for the delivery of, property or money; any purchase, discount, or other acquisition of, or any credit upon the security of, any obligation or claim arising out of any of the foregoing; and any transaction or series of transactions having a similar purpose or effect.

(3) "Person" includes any individual, partnership, association, business trust, corporation, or unincorporated organization.

SEC. 7. Any person who willfully violates any provision of this Act or any rule, regulation, or order issued thereunder, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

SEC. 8. Public Law 386, 80th Congress (61 Stat. 921), is hereby repealed.

The address presented by Mr. BUSH is as follows:

CONSUMER CREDIT: A ROSE OR A THORN?

(Address of C. Canby Balderston, Vice Chairman, Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, at the New York State Bankers Association Management Conference on Installment Credit, Hotel Commodore, New York City, October 23, 1958)

In his essay on Compensation, Emerson observed that "Every sweet hath its sour; every evil its good. * * * For every benefit which you receive, a tax is levied. * * * Every thing has two sides, a good and an evil."

The age-old problem of how to have roses without thorns is well illustrated by consumer credit. Consumer credit may properly be referred to as a rose because of the role that it has played in advancing the scale of living of citizens generally. Doubtless technical advance would have permitted Americans to achieve eventually the wide ownership of homes, autos, bathtubs and television that they have now achieved. But consumer credit enabled them to get these things sooner than otherwise. The saving process is so slow for a young family with children that they prefer to go into debt to own a home of their choice and to equip it rather than to wait indefinitely. Even those who are critical of the gadgets that surround us must admit that an astounding proportion of Americans now have the physical basis for a pleasanter life. And those who were skeptical of the consumers' ability to handle debt must recognize that the record of financial responsibility has been remarkably good.

Like most roses, consumer credit also has its thorns. The recession from which we are emerging, in part a consumer-durable-goods recession, reminds us of the influence of consumer credit in the consumer boom of 1955. In that year the outstanding volume of installment credit increased $5½ billion or almost 25 percent. This increase was accompanied by a significant easing in the terms on which consumer credit was extended, particularly credit to purchase new automobiles. By mid-1955, 30-month installment contracts on new automoblies were typical as against 24 months the year before, and contracts with 36-month maturities were becoming common. At that time, the downpayments standard of one-third of the transaction price was still being adhered to, but overallowances on trade-ins were lowering the effective downpayment and the buyer's equity. With this impetus, 7.4 million new cars were sold in the domestic market, an increase of more than one-third over 1954. The same liberalization of terms was evident in the use of credit to expand residential construction at an accelerated rate. You will remember that in 1955 new housing starts reached 1,329,000.

In the second half of that year the thorns began to appear in the shape of increases in the prices of industrial products amounting to almost 4 percent. The chain of events that followed has caused many thoughtful persons to question whether the obvious gains from the use of consumer credit are bought at too high a social cost if it accelerates an already booming market for consumer durables. You will recall that the consumer boom of 1955 was followed by an expansion of inventories in every consumer-durables industry during 1956 even though the sale of automobiles declined sharply. This industry, a mighty force in the economy, appeared to have overextended itself and to have slowed down for a while. Automobile executives and workers must have regretted that the 1955 market was oversold by at least a million cars.

This consumer boom was no small factor in inducing subsequent management decisions that were not altogether prudent. In 1956 businessmen expanded their outlays for plant and equipment at a rate 22 percent faster than in the year before. Thus a plant-expansion boom, triggered in part by the consumer boom of 1955, drove the cost of building materials and labor higher and higher. This upward movement led some manufacturers to believe that if they were going to need expanded capacity, they had better get it promptly before costs rose still higher. As a result, many of them discounted the growth in demand for their product for years ahead. When the awakening came during the last half of 1957, many industries became aware of excess capacity.

Most tragic of all was the unemployment that resulted. Having obtained the consumer durables that they needed most, having automobiles that were still good for thousands of miles, and becoming disenchanted with the increased prices, consumers went on a buyers' holiday. There developed an oversupply of stoves, refrigerators, washing machines, radios and television sets. Production schedules were cut back and men were laid off. The construction boom also languished and here again men were laid off. And so, in 1957 and 1958, society paid in unemployment, lost salaries and lost profits the price of another bust that followed in the wake of a boom which we must, in all honesty, recognize was helped on its way by the excessively rapid growth of consumer credit.

This poses the question as to whether it is socially desirable to have selective control over consumer credit, in addition to general fiscal and monetary control. The decision must represent a value judgment based upon a balancing of gains against disadvantages. To diminish the unstabilizing effects of consumer credit has strong appeal to those who feel that, despite its benefits, excessive fluctuations in its use should be prevented in order to minimize economic instability. But if selective control is to be employed, the disadvantages of such control need to be faced up to and removed if possible. In the use of margin requirements to prevent excessive flow of credit into the stock market, supervision and enforcement are not too difficult. In three previous efforts to regulate consumer credit, however, the administrative difficulties were so great that the Federal Reserve System, which had the task of enforcement, and the 200,000 retailers and financial institutions to whom the regulation applied breathed a sigh of relief when the ordeal was over.

To gain a proper perspective of the role of selective controls, one must compare them with general fiscal and monetary policy. Fiscal policy acts through governmental surpluses or deficits, which reflect both governmental spending and taxing. The direct responsibility rests upon the Congress and the Treasury. General monetary control, entrusted by the Congress to the Federal Reserve System, has the particular role of regulating the reserves available to the commercial banks so that bank credit may contract and expand flexibly in accordance with the fluctuating needs of the economy. The Federal Reserve has the task of controlling the supply of money and credit in total, leaving its allocation to the competitive forces of the free market. Credit is allocated in the market place to those creditworthy borrowers who are willing to pay the going price. The apportionment among individual borrowers is left to competition between private borrowers and private lenders, even though the responsibility for influencing the total supply of credit rests with the central bank.

In contrast to this relatively impersonal allocation of the money supply are so-called selective or direct controls. Broadly speaking, they embrace rationing, and price and wage controls, as well as regulation of specific uses of credit. If any of these is used, government intervenes in the operation of the free market. Of course it also intervenes when it uses subsidies, price supports, and guarantees to shelter particular groups of citizens. It is clear that even if these supplementary controls are helpful in meeting emergencies, they are no substitute for general fiscal and monetary controls. Without the general controls, inflationary pressures will break loose eventually.

Through the use of general credit measures, supplemented by stock-margin regulations, economic fluctuations have been greatly moderated in the period since 1950, despite a sharp increase in both public and private debt. Since 1950 we have added $20 billion to consumer installment credit outstanding, $90 billion to mortgage debt, and $85 billion to corporate debt—in considerable part to finance additions to plant and equipment. We have also added to the Federal debt, largely as a result of the need to reorganize and reequip the defense establishment in view of the rapid technical advances which have taken place in a world of continuing international tensions. At the same time State and local governments have borrowed $30 billion to finance schools and highways and for other purposes.

When one contemplates these magnitudes and the rates of increase they imply, both in credit and in our stock of real wealth—homes, automobiles, factories, and public facilities—it seems almost a miracle that we have been able to accomplish so much growth and still maintain as much stability as we have had in prices and employment. I am convinced that we could not have done even this well if we had not clung tenaciously to a sound, flexible monetary policy.

Reliance on general credit measures alone, of course, has limitations. Despite the manifest necessity for a sound general credit policy, and despite the manifest advantages of permitting the market to carry out the function of credit allocation, conditions may at times develop in specific areas that to some people would justify selective credit controls. Developments in a particular area may be unsound in themselves; or the area may be absorbing too much of the total credit expansion that is appropriate to the situation. Under such circumstances, public opinion may come to insist upon selective controls to supplement general ones.

The Federal Reserve System made a study of the consumer-credit field almost 2 years ago and concluded that selective controls of consumer credit were not called for at that time. It is possible, however, that developments in the future might call for a reconsideration of that view. They might create a widespread public demand for consumer-credit controls as an alternative to enhanced cyclical fluctuations or to an increased degree of general credit restraint. Such feeling might be generated, for example, if terms were once more eased radically at a time when credit demand and consumer spending were on the increase. In that case, society might decide that the benefits to be gained by consumer-credit regulation would outweigh the difficulties. If so, we should benefit from the experience during periods of regulation so as to minimize administrative difficulties.

And so I return to the question posed at the beginning of my remarks. This question has been put into verse by the economist, Kenneth Boulding:

"The fruits of the financial system
Are quite impressive, once you list 'em,
Although the system has the power
To turn its fruits extremely sour." [1]

AMENDMENT OF EMPLOYMENT ACT OF 1946

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Employment Act of 1946 to make relative stability of prices an explicit aim of Federal economic policy, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 64) to amend the Employment Act of 1946 to make relative stability of prices an explicit aim of Federal economic policy, introduced by Mr. BUSH (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I am privileged to have as cosponsors of the bill four of my colleagues on the Committee on Banking and Currency, namely, the distinguished senior Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT], the distinguished senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], the distinguished senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], and the distinguished junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE].

I ask unanimous consent that the bill may lie on the desk until the close of business on Monday, January 12, so that other Senators may join in sponsorship if they so desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BUSH. The proposed amendments to the Employment Act are directed against the dangerous inflationary trends which persist in our economy, and, if unchecked, can do serious damage to our defense effort and, indeed, undermine our society.

Concern has been expressed that a relatively stable cost of living can be accomplished only at the expense of serious unemployment. I strongly repudiate that defeatist attitude. There is no necessity of choosing between a sound currency and a high level of employment. Both are within our reach, if we have the wisdom and courage to adopt sound policies to attain them.

Adoption of the amendments would strengthen the Employment Act. It would help to avoid the "boom and bust" cycles which have been the source of serious unemployment in the past. It would fortify confidence in the future of the American dollar and stimulate the savings and investment essential to create jobs in a growing America.

I was pleased to read news accounts of a recent speech by the distinguished majority leader [Mr. JOHNSON] indicating his awareness of the grave danger to our national economy created by inflation.

However, with all respect, I must disagree with his proposal to have the problem of inflation investigated by a committee without responsibility for recommending legislation to the Congress.

The American people have had enough talk about inflation. They are looking to Congress to do something about it.

I have therefore urged the chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. FULBRIGHT] to schedule hearings on the bill as early in the present session as possible. This committee is the committee which drafted the Employment Act, and has the basic responsibility for considering proposals to amend that act and to prevent the debasing of our currency by inflation.

I shall have more to say later on the subject of inflation, in methods which I believe might help keep it under control, including fiscal responsibility in the Government of the United States.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of portions of the Employment Act of 1946, as it would be affected by my amendment, be printed in the RECORD following these remarks.

There being no objection, the text was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE EMPLOYMENT ACT OF 1946 AS PROPOSED TO BE AMENDED

[New language in italic; language to be omitted in brackets]

SEC. 2. The Congress hereby declares that it is the continuing policy and responsibility of the Federal Government to use all practicable means consistent with its needs and obligations and other essential considerations of national policy, with the assistance and cooperation of industry, agriculture, labor, and State and local governments, to coordinate and utilize all of its plans, functions, and resources for the purpose of creating and maintaining, in a manner calculated to foster and promote free competitive enterprise and the general welfare, conditions under which there will be afforded useful employment opportunities, including self-employment, for those able, willing, and seeking to work, and to promote maximum employment, production, and purchasing power.

The Congress further declares that the foregoing objectives must be attained, if they are to be meaningful, in an economy in which the level of prices remains relatively stable under free competitive enterprise.

SEC. 3. (a) The President shall transmit to the Congress at not later than January 20 of each year an economic report (hereinafter called the Economic Report) setting forth (1) the levels of employment, production, and purchasing power obtaining in the United States and such levels needed to carry out the policy declared in section 2; (2) current and foreseeable trends in the levels of employment, production, and purchasing power; (3) a review of the economic program of the Federal Government and a review of economic conditions affecting employment in the United States or any considerable portion thereof during the preceding year and of their effect upon employment, production, and purchasing power; [and (4)] (4) current and foreseeable trends in price levels prevailing in the economy and the steps, if any, which have been taken to counter inflationary or deflationary pressures arising within the economy; and (5) a program for carrying out the policy declared in section 2, together with such recommendations for legislation as he may deem necessary or desirable.

SEC. 4. (a) There is created in the Executive Office of the President a Council of Economic Advisers (hereinafter called the Council). The Council shall be composed of three members who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and each of whom shall be a person who, as a result of his training, experience, and attainments, is exceptionally qualified to analyze and interpret economic developments to appraise programs and activities of the Government in the light of the policy declared in section 2, and to formulate and recommend national economic policy to promote employment, production, [and purchasing power under free competitive enterprise.] purchasing power, and a relative stable price level under free competitive enterprise. The President shall designate one of the members of the Council as chairman and one as vice chairman, who shall act as chairman in the absence of the chairman.

(c) It shall be the duty and function of the Council—

* * * * *

(4) to develop and recommend to the President national economic policies to foster and promote free competitive enterprise, to avoid economic fluctuations or to diminish the effects thereof, and to maintain employment, production, [and purchasing power] purchasing power, and a relatively stable price level.

INTERIM AUTHORIZATION FOR HOME MORTGAGE INSURANCE, URBAN RENEWAL, AND COLLEGE HOUSING

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH], the Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL], I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to provide for the quick authorization of funds which the Federal Housing Administration needs to carry on continuous insurance of loans for housing, college housing, and urban renewal housing.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill together with an explanation of it be printed in the body of the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred. Without objection, the bill and the explanation of it will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 65) to provide interim authorization for home mortgage insurance, urban renewal, and college housing, introduced by Mr. CAPEHART (for himself, Mr. BUSH, Mr. BENNETT, and Mr. BEALL), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 217 of the National Housing Act is amended by striking out "$7,000,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$13,000,000,000."

SEC. 2. Section 103 (b) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended by—

(1) Striking out in the first sentence all before the proviso and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "The Administrator, on and after July 1, 1949, may, with the approval of the President, contract to make capital grants with respect to projects assisted under this title aggregating not to exceed $1,450,000,000:", and

SEC. 3. Section 401 (d) of the Housing Act of 1950 is amended by striking out "$925,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$1,125,000,000" and by striking out "$100,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$125,000,000."

EXPLANATION

This bill would provide immediate increases in authorizations urgently needed to permit continuation of three major programs of the Housing and Home Finance Agency. Under this resolution, the programs could continue until the Congress has an opportunity to more fully consider these and other operations administered by the Agency. The sections of the bill are summarized as follows:

SECTION 1. Increase in FHA mortgage insurance authorization: This section would increase the FHA general mortgage insurance authorization by $6 billion and thus assure the availability of FHA insurance programs during the crucial months of spring. It is estimated that this amount would be adequate for operations until June 30, 1959.

Because of the unexpected and unprecedented heavy volume of new and existing home applications for insurance from May through September 1958, the $4 billion authorization provided in June 1948 was approaching exhaustion by mid-October. Net use of more than $900 million of authorization occurred in the month of September alone. In order to conserve the available authorization and obtain maximum benefit from the inflow of authorization from expiration of commitments and repayment of insured mortgages, special procedures were put into effect by FHA in mid-October.

Under these procedures, for home-mortgage applications which do not involve owner occupants (i.e., applications for firm or conditional commitments on new construction for builders and for conditional commitments on existing construction), FHA issues agreements to insure. These are accompanied by unsigned commitments and are convertible at a later date into firm commitments for the benefit of owner-occupant mortgagors upon the condition that FHA insurance authorization is available. Through these special procedures, the home-financing industry can operate for a limited period with a substantially reduced net use of FHA insurance authorization. In time, however, the conversion of these agreements to insure into commitments and the reduced volume of expirations of commitments would raise the net use of authorization to the same levels which would otherwise occur under normal commitment procedures.

Issuance of commitments in exchange for all outstanding agreements to insure and the issuance of commitments for applications under examination and for additional applications received during the remainder of the fiscal year for both home and project operations would require between $5 billion and $6 billion of additional insurance authorization. This estimate contemplates a reduction of application volume by 10 to 15 percent from the unprecedented levels of last August and September and maintenance of project applications at the levels of recent months.

SEC. 2. Increase in URA capital-grant authorization: This section would make available to the Housing Administrator additional capital-grant obligational authority in the amount of $100 million. In addition, it would reestablish the authority of the President to make available not more than an additional $100 million.

Because of the failure of omnibus housing legislation in the 85th Congress, the urban-renewal program was left at the start of the current fiscal year with only $54 million in unreserved capital grant authority, whereas the administration had proposed a program level of $254 million in capital grant authority for the year. In order to keep the program operating until the 86th Congress convened, it was necessary for the President to release the $100 million reserve of capital grant authority that had been provided in the Housing Act of 1949. This provided a total of $154 million that was available for capital grant needs in the current fiscal year. These funds have now been virtually exhausted by the capital grant reservations and contract commitments that have been made by the housing agency since July 1, 1958. The small amount of remaining grant authority will be needed for increases in the capital grant requirements of projects that have been approved in the past, leaving no funds available for the initiation of new projects until Congress provides additional capital grant authority.

The grant authority provided in this section would keep the program operating until the end of the fiscal year on the level anticipated by the President's budget proposals, and would also reconstitute the reserve of capital grant authority for release by the President at any future time the public interest so dictates.

SEC. 3. Increase in college housing loan authorization: This section would increase the college housing loan authorization by $200 million (from $925 million to $1,125 million). The $100 million limit on the part of this authorization which can be used for other educational facilities would also be increased by $25 million. At June 30, 1958, the uncommitted balance of the present total authorization was $26.7 million. This sum was rapidly committed during the next few months, so that at the present time the only uncommitted loan funds are those which are being held in reserve to cover cost overruns on loans hitherto approved. In the interim and in accord with the President's statement of August 27, 1958, the housing agency has continued to accept applications and has allocated funds on a contingency basis. As of December 31, 1958, 103 applications totaling $84 million had been filed during fiscal year 1959. Present trends of application receipts indicate that the authorization contained in this section would be committed by the end of this fiscal year.

The need for college housing is largely a reflection of college enrollments. From 1950 to 1958 fall college enrollment increased from 2,297,000 to 3,623,000, a rise of 58 percent. During the next 10–15 years enrollment is expected to double, exceeding 6 million students in 1970. Both the college age group and the percentage of that group enrolling in colleges is expected to rise annually throughout this period. High construction costs and the difficulty of obtaining private financing upon reasonably comparable terms have complicated the problem.

Under existing law, not more than $100 million of the above authorization can be used for other educational facilities. This section of the bill would increase that ceiling to $125 million to permit loans to be made to the many colleges, particularly the urban institutions whose students largely live at home, for facilities containing dining and related accommodations. Providing a student with necessary dining facilities is equally as important as the provision of housing accommodations.

RESTORATION OF RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ADMINISTRATION AS AN INDEPENDENT AGENCY

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have decided, after much study of all aspects of the problem, to introduce legislation which proposes to restore the Rural Electrification Administration to the independent status it held at the time of its creation. I am delighted that my distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], is joining me in introduction of this legislation. The Senator from Georgia has long been a devoted supporter of our REA programs and I doubt that any men in the Congress can exceed his knowledge and understanding of the operations of the Rural Electrification Administration.

The Administration set up by the Congress in 1936 was an independent agency until it was placed in the Department of Agriculture, "under the general direction and supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture," by President Roosevelt in his Reorganization Plan Number Two in May 1939. In 1953, Reorganization Plan Number Two of that year transferred further operations of the REA to the control of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Since that time there has been much strife as the result of the transfer. One of the most acute issues as a result of the 1953 plan is that the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to review any loans in excess of $500,000 made by the REA. Because of this, legislation was introduced in the last Congress to nullify the 1953 Reorganization Plan. I sat through the hearings on this legislation and noted the intense feeling over the 1953 plan although every witness who appeared in opposition to it stated that, at no time in his experience, had the review of loans defeated any loan in excess of $500,000 approved by Administrator Hamil.

It does seem to me that no sound purpose can be served by leaving the Rural Electrification Administration within the Department of Agriculture. It can operate independently in the highly successful manner it was originally conceived to do. This independent operation will, I am sure, meet with the approval of the vast majority of leaders in our rural electric communities. During hearings on the 1953 Reorganization Plan a brief filed by Clyde Ellis, executive secretary for the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, stated:

> Rural electric leaders have never become reconciled to the placing of REA in the Department of Agriculture and have continued to feel that the program would be better served by a completely independent agency.

I have witnessed the great benefit of rural electrification to farms in this country. This has, perhaps, been the greatest gain for farmers in our generation. To me, it appears very sound to re-create REA as an independent agency with all the powers and duties which were originally intended. At the same time this can also serve the original purpose of operating this agency as a nonpartisan service organization for all farmers. My legislation, if enacted, will authorize a complete and unhampered operation of the Rural Electrification Administration.

To conform with accepted procedure, this legislation proposes appointment of the Administrator for a 10-year term upon the reestablishment of the independent status of the agency. It is most certainly to be assumed that the present Administrator, David A. Hamil, will be reappointed subsequent to enactment of this bill by the 86th Congress. Mr. Hamil has done an excellent job as REA Administrator. He enjoys the confidence of the Executive, the Congress and REA consumers throughout the country. We are deeply indebted to him for an able and thorough performance as REA Administrator.

My sole purpose is to further the cause of rural electrification, a program which I have consistently supported throughout the entire 20 years of my service in Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 75) to establish the Rural Electrification Administration as an independent agency, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. CURTIS (for himself and Mr. RUSSELL), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

SETTLEMENT OF LABOR DISPUTES INVOLVING COMMON CARRIERS BY AIR

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to amend the Railway Labor Act with respect to the settlement of labor disputes involving common carriers by air, and ask that it be appropriately referred.

The bill provides for the compulsory arbitration of a dispute between a common carrier by air and its employees, in lieu of the present provision for the appointment of an emergency board contained in the Railway Labor Act, if in the judgment of the President of the United States any lockout, strike, or other concerted stoppage of work resulting, or which threatens to result, from such dispute, would substantially interrupt commerce to such a degree as to deprive persons of transportation by air to or from any point in the United States, to and from which such transportation is normally provided by such carrier, and severe hardship would result therefrom.

The board of arbitration would consist of one public member appointed by the President and one member designated by each of the parties to the dispute. If either party to the dispute fails or refuses to designate its member within one week after appointment of the public member the President shall appoint such member in the same manner as the public member is appointed. A decision of the majority shall constitute a decision of the board. Each member of the board of arbitration named by the parties to the dispute will be compensated by the party naming him. The Federal Government shall pay to the public member reasonable compensation for his services in an amount fixed by the President and shall reimburse him for expenses incurred.

The board shall hold hearings at which parties to the dispute will have an opportunity to be heard, and its findings and award shall be handed down within 60 days after its appointment, except that the President may for good cause extend such period up to 30 additional days. The award of the board shall become binding upon and shall control the relationship between the parties from the date of filing until expiration of 1 year from such date, but the award may be changed by mutual agreement of the parties.

Within 15 days from the date of the award either party to the dispute may petition the U.S. district court for the district in which the award was filed for a review of such award on the ground that (a) parties were not given reasonable opportunity to be heard; (b) the board of arbitration exceeded its powers; (c) the award is unreasonable in that it is not supported by the evidence, or (d) that the award was procured by fraud, collusion, or other unlawful means or methods. Such court, without a jury, shall hear the evidence with respect to the issue raised and its decision shall be final unless within 10 days either party shall apply to the appropriate U.S. court of appeals for a review of such decision.

If through the above court procedure the award of the arbitration board is reversed the mediation board shall promptly notify the President, and he shall reconvene the board or appoint a new board of arbitration and the board shall proceed to take such action as may be required by the court's decision.

Under this bill it would be unlawful during any period beginning with the date of an order by the President to the parties concerned to submit their dispute to an arbitration board and ending on the date on which an award of a board of arbitration ceases to be in effect, first, for any carrier to engage in a lockout; second, for employees of such carrier to engage in a strike or any other concerted stoppage of work; third, for any labor organization representing employees of such carrier to engage or encourage such employees to engage in any strike or concerted work stoppage; fourth, for any carrier, labor organization, or individual to willfully fail or refuse to carry out any duty imposed by an award of the board of arbitration; or fifth, for either party to the dispute to make any change in the conditions out of which the dispute arose except as provided in the award or agreed upon by both parties. Appropriate penalties and court procedures are provided in the bill for enforcing these provisions.

Mr. President, I am not unaware of the fact that this is a controversial proposal, but recent strikes in some of our major airlines have forcefully brought out the fact that the greatest sufferer in these strikes is the general public—particularly in those strikes timed to take place at the height of the Christmas season when thousands of people expect to take advantage of fast travel provided by airlines to spend Christmas with their loved ones. Not only do I think it is proper to prohibit strikes and lockouts in this industry to protect the traveling public and the communities which are served by the airlines, but I feel that Congress has a definite responsibility to do so in view of the fact that the American taxpayer has made, and will continue to make, a substantial financial contribution to the safe and continuous operation of airlines in this country.

As chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee which handles requests for civil aviation affairs, I feel I have a duty to the Senate and to the general public to call attention to the financial support the Federal Government gives to civil aviation, and thus to the airlines.

The airline industry in America is unique in that the Federal Government—the American taxpayer, the one who suffers as a result of airline strikes—has expended billions of dollars for construction of airports and facilities; for the installation, operation, and maintenance of expensive navigational aids; and for the payment of subsidies to the airlines. This industry is almost completely controlled by the Federal Government. A Federal agency determines the routes an airline will be permitted to fly. The rates to be charged on every commercial flight are controlled by a Federal agency. The Federal Government even controls licensing of personnel such as pilots and mechanics.

Mr. President, to illustrate the financial interests of the American taxpayer in civil aviation, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in my remarks a table of appropriations and other authorizations for civil aviation activities in the last 10 years.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Appropriations and other authorizations for civil aviation activities (1950–59)

[In millions of dollars]

Fiscal year	Airports	Facilities	Maintenance and operation	Payments to air carriers
1950	39.5	33.1	102.5	(1)

And in addition $82,280,500 for Washington airports; $31,500,000 for the Airways Modernization Board; $4,844,094 for Alaskan airports; and $42,397,500 for administrative expenses of the Civil Aeronautics Board.

RECAPITULATION

Airports	348.7
Facilities	459.5
Maintenance and operation	1,316.5
Subsidies	276.3
Total	2,562.6

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I have included "other authorizations" in this compilation solely for the purpose of bringing in the money expended for airport construction, most of which has already been appropriated and the remainder will be appropriated at the proper time.

I hope Senators will take time to read in the RECORD tomorrow this complete recapitulation of Federal moneys expended for civil aviation, but in order that those present may have some idea of the vast sums expended for this purpose let me say that for airport construction $348.7 million in Federal funds have been or will be expended over this 10-year period. Of interest also is the fact that over the 10-year period of 1947–56, which is the latest compilation available, State and local governments expended $324,998,000 for airport construction.

For construction of facilities the Federal Government has expended $459.5 million since 1950, and for maintenance and operation of same $1,316,500,000.

Prior to fiscal year 1954 we did not have a breakdown between airmail pay and actual subsidy, but since these have been reported separately—the last 6 years—the Federal Government has paid $276.3 million as subsidy to the airlines.

Mr. President, the total Federal expenditure since 1950 for the purposes which I have just been discussing is approximately $2,562,600,000.

Senators may remember that in the current fiscal year we embarked on a 5-year Federal airway modernization plan. I call to their attention the fact that the anticipated costs for the next 4 years of this program is now estimated at $852 million, and during the next 4 years the expected costs for maintenance and operation of facilities under the new plan is in excess of $1½ billion.

If this contribution by the general public for facilities which are made available to the airlines, as well as other aircraft, does not justify the public's demand for continuous services, and place this industry in a unique position with reference to its obligation to provide uninterrupted service, then I am sadly mistaken.

With reference to subsidizing airlines, I am sure Senators will be interested to know that a recent Court decision requires the CAB to take into consideration in determining eligibility for subsidy, and the amount of same, the loss due to a strike, unless the Board determines that it would not have occurred under "honest, economical, and efficient management." Therefore, Mr. President, not only is the general public inconvenienced in its travel, both business and pleasure; not only are thousands of communities in the United States dealt a devastating blow to their economy by airline strikes, the recent one in Eastern Air Line costing Florida communities approximately $25 million; not only does the American taxpayer pay vast sums to make possible a thriving and safe airline industry; not only do the Federal and State Governments expend funds for unemployment payment to thousands of persons out of work due to the strikes, most of whom are not strike participants; but under existing law if an airline is forced by a normal strike to seek subsidy, the American taxpayer must once more dig into his pocket to pay part of the loss suffered by the airline because of the refusal of a certain segment of its employees to perform their necessary functions.

Mr. President, again I say that I know full well the controversial aspects of the proposal I make today, but I do not believe in the history of this Nation a better case has been made for the need, and right, of the American public to have protection against a strike by so few which vitally affects so many.

I have not brought into my discussion the loss a strike causes to thousands of stockholders—large and small—or the loss of their livelihood by thousands of airline employees who are not on strike, or the delays and interruptions to our defense efforts which call for numerous flights on commercial airlines, all of which are important. I base my appeal for compulsory arbitration solely on the right of the general public—which heavily subsidizes this industry—to have available the service which has become a vital part of our everyday life.

Mr. President, I hope this measure will be acted upon speedily. I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in my remarks the text of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 80) to amend the Railway Labor Act with respect to the settlement of labor disputes involving common carriers by air, introduced by Mr. HOLLAND, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 10 of the Railway Labor Act, as amended, is amended by inserting "(a)" after the section number, and by adding at the end thereof the following:

"The foregoing provisions of this section shall not apply to common carriers by air.

"(b)(1) If a dispute between a common carrier by air and its employees be not adjusted under the foregoing sections of this Act the Mediation Board shall notify the President. If, in the judgment of the President, any lockout, strike, or other concerted stoppage of work resulting, or which threatens to result, from such dispute would substantially interrupt commerce to such a degree as to deprive persons seeking transportation by air to or from any point in the United States to and from which such transportation is normally provided by such carrier of such transportation, and severe hardship would result therefrom, he may order the submission of such dispute to a board of arbitration as provided in this subsection.

"(2) A board of arbitration under this subsection shall consist of one public member appointed by the President, and one member designated in writing by each of the parties to the dispute. If either party to the dispute shall fail or refuse to designate its member within one week after appointment of the public member, the President shall appoint such member in the same manner as the public member is appointed. Each member of the board of arbitration named by the parties to the dispute shall be compensated by the party naming him. Any arbitrator appointed by the President shall be paid reasonable compensation for his services in an amount to be fixed by the President, and shall be reimbursed for his necessary traveling expenses and expenses actually incurred for subsistence while serving as an arbitrator. The provisions of subparagraphs (b), (c), (d), (f), (g), and (h) of paragraph Third of section 7 of this Act (45 U.S.C. 157, Third, (b), (c), (d), (f), (h)) shall apply to the organization and procedure of a board of arbitration under this subsection.

"(3) A board of arbitration appointed under this subsection shall promptly hold hearings at which both parties to the dispute shall have an opportunity to be present, both personally and by counsel, and to present such oral and documentary evidence as the board of arbitration shall deem relevant to the issue or issues in controversy. The board of arbitration shall make written findings of fact and shall promulgate a written award upon the issue or issues in dispute. In making such findings the board of arbitration shall consider only, and be bound only, by the evidence submitted. When a valid contract is in effect defining the rights, duties, and liabilities of the parties with respect to any matter in dispute, the board of arbitration shall have power only to determine the proper interpretation and application of the contract provisions which are involved. Where wage rates and other conditions of employment under a proposed new or proposed amended contract are in dispute, the board of arbitration shall establish rates of pay and conditions of employment which are fair and equitable to the parties. No award of the board of arbitration relating to wages or rates of pay shall be retroactive to a date before the date of the termination of any contract which may have existed between the parties. The findings and award of the board of arbitration shall be handed down within 60 days after its appointment, except that the President may, for good cause, extend such period for not to exceed 30 days. A decision of a majority of the members of the board of arbitration shall constitute a decision of such board. Upon the filing of copies of the award as provided in subparagraph (f) of paragraph 3d of section 7 of this act (45 U.S.C. 157, 3d(f)) such award, together with such agreements as the parties may themselves have reached, shall become binding upon and shall control the relationship between the parties from the date of such filing until the expiration of 1 year from such date, but such award may be changed by mutual consent or agreement of the parties.

"(4) Either party to the dispute may, within 15 days from the date the award is filed as provided in subparagraph (f) of this paragraph 3 of section 7 of this act (45 U.S.C. 157, 3(f)), petition the United States district court for the district in which such award was so filed for a review of such award on the ground (A) that the parties were not given reasonable opportunity to be heard, (B) that the board of arbitration exceeded its powers, (C) that the award is unreasonable in that it is not supported by the evidence, or (D) that the award was procured by fraud, collusion, or other unlawful means or methods. Such court, without the intervention of a jury, shall hear the evidence adduced by the parties with respect to the issue raised by the petition and may reverse the award only if it finds that (1) one of the parties was not given reasonable opportunity to be heard, (ii) that the board of arbitration exceeded its powers, (iii) that the order is unreasonable in that it is not supported by the evidence, or (iv) that the order was procured by fraud, collusion, or other unlawful means or methods. The decision of the district court shall be final unless within 10 days either party shall apply to the appropriate United States court of appeals for a review of such decision. If the district court reverses the award for one of the reasons stated in this paragraph and no appeal is taken or the reversal of such award is affirmed on appeal, or if an order of the district court affirming an award is reversed on appeal, the Mediation Board shall promptly notify the President. Upon such notification the President may reconvene the board of arbitration or may appoint a new board of arbitration and such reconvened or newly appointed board of arbitration shall proceed to take such action as may be required by the court's decision.

"(5) It shall be unlawful during any period beginning with the date of issuance of an order by the President under paragraph (1) of this subsection and ending on the date on which an award of a board of arbitration under this subsection ceases to be in effect—

"(A) For any carrier which is a party to a dispute with respect to which an order was issued under paragraph (1) of this subsection to engage in a lockout;

"(B) For employees of such carrier to engage in a strike or other concerted stoppage of work;

"(C) For any labor organization representing the employees of such carrier to engage, or encourage such employees to engage, in any strike or other concerted stoppage of work;

"(D) For any carrier, labor organization, or individual to willfully fail or refuse to carry out any duty imposed by an award of a board of arbitration under this subsection; or

"(E) For either party to the dispute to make any change in the conditions out of which the dispute arose except as provided in the award or agreed upon by both such parties.

"(6) Whoever violates the provisions of paragraph (5) shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both.

"(7) In any case in which, during any period beginning with the date of issuance of an order by the President under paragraph (1) of this subsection and ending on the date on which an award of a board of arbitration under this subsection ceases to be in effect, a carrier which is a party to the dispute with respect to which such order was issued engages in any lock-out, or a labor organization which is a party to such dispute orders or encourages the employees of such carrier to engage in a strike or other concerted stoppage of work, or a substantial number of the members of such labor organization engage in any concerted or simultaneous action, which results in an interruption in or suspension of the operation of such carrier, such carrier or labor organization, as the case may be, shall be subject to a penalty of not to exceed $10,000 for each day that such interruption or suspension continues, which penalty shall be recoverable in a civil suit brought by the United States for that purpose.

"(8) Any person adversely affected by reason of any violation of the provisions of this subsection may file an action in the United States district court for the district in which such violation occurred to restrain and enjoin such violation and to compel the performance of the duties imposed by this subsection. The provisions of section 6 and 20 of the act entitled 'An Act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes', approved October 15, 1914, as amended (15 U.S.C. 17; 29 U.S.C. 52), and the provisions of the act entitled 'An Act to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes', approved March 23, 1932 (29 U.S.C. 101 et seq.), shall not be applicable to proceedings commenced under this paragraph."

PROPOSED LEGISLATION RELATING TO HATE BOMBINGS, AND SO FORTH

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, my colleague, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] has today introduced a bill to prohibit certain acts involving the importation, transportation, possession or use of explosives in interstate commerce, the so-called antibombing bill, with 14 sponsors. I am today introducing six other bills, which represent the antihate bombing package of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] and myself, generally directed to the same subject.

Mr. President, I have the honor to announce as cosponsors, in addition to the two Senators from New York, on the first bill, the bill introduced by my colleague [Mr. KEATING], Mr. ALLOTT, Mr. BEALL, Mr. BENNETT, Mr. COOPER, Mr. KUCHEL, Mr. LANGER, Mr. MARTIN, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. BRIDGES, Mr. CASE of New Jersey, Mr. PROUTY, and Mrs. SMITH.

I have the honor to announce, as to the other six bills, the cosponsorship of the following Senators: Mr. ALLOTT, Mr. BEALL, Mr. BENNETT, Mr. COOPER, Mr. KUCHEL, Mr. LANGER, and Mr. MARTIN.

Mr. President, the genesis of these measures arises from the shocking bombings—shocking alike to men and women in every section of the country—of schools, places of worship without regard to faith, homes and business places, so connected with the tensions arising from efforts at desegregation in a number of our Southern States.

Following the congressional campaign of 1958 the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] and I made a trip to three major cities: Jacksonville, Atlanta, and Birmingham. These are cities where such outrages had occurred. I am very proud to state that we found the greatest feeling of resentment and outrage on the part of all citizens, as well as officialdom. We did our best to come modestly and learn all we could. Having advised our colleagues from those States in advance that we were coming, we were received very graciously by the local municipal officials and had an opportunity to learn something about the situation right on the ground. Unfortunately in one place there was the experience, which we deprecated, of a meeting which did not have any participation of Negro leadership, but we did our best to repair that by interviewing some of the Negro leaders ourselves.

Mr. President, in respect to the introduction of this proposed legislation, I describe it as the following seven proposals:

A bill to make interstate transportation of explosives a crime when the intent is to damage or destroy any building for the purpose of interfering with its use or to intimidate any person.

That is the bill introduced by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] with 13 additional sponsors. The next six bills are introduced by me, and in each case the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] is a cosponsor, with seven additional Senators as cosponsors, for a total of nine Senators in sponsorship. The bills relate to the following:

An amendment to the fugitive felon statute, 18 U.S.C. 1073, which forbids travel across State lines to avoid prosecution or imprisonment, to include among the crimes of violence listed the "willful destruction of any building or structure."

A bill to extend to Federal officials protection against threats and violence.

A bill to ban from the mails material tending to incite specific acts of violence such as murder, arson, assault, rape and willful destruction of any building or structure, etc., listed in the fugitive felon statute, as amended.

An amendment to the postal laws, 39 U.S.C. 259, to give the Postmaster General the authority to enforce provisions banning such mail.

An amendment to the interstate threats statute, 18 U.S.C. 875, to ban such threats where their purpose is to interfere with Federal or State laws or decrees.

A similar amendment to the mail threats statute, 18 U.S.C. 876, to bar such threats.

Hate mail has become an increasingly serious problem. The Post Office Department reports that complaints about it quadrupled in 1958. Officers who arrested the Atlanta Temple bombing suspects reported finding large supplies of anti-Semitic and anti-Negro literature in their homes. Mass mailings of this kind of material which tries to exploit bigotry, lawlessness and discrimination have reportedly closely preceded some of the recent bombings.

It is becoming increasingly difficult to separate the propaganda of hate from the actual terror, the bombings and the threats to determine which comes first.

There is no doubt in our minds that the average citizen in the South is as deeply shocked and outraged by the nearly 70 bombings and attempted bombings reported since 1954, including 27 incidents last year, as is the Nation as a whole. We found considerable support among southern officials for a law such as we now propose to give the FBI concurrent jurisdiction in hate bombing cases so that it can act immediately, just as it does now in kidnapings as authorized by the Lindbergh Act.

Although law enforcement officials in these southern communities told us they were doing their utmost to catch the hate bombers, many of them emphasized that lack of jurisdiction and resources severely limit their ability to track down and bring to justice what their evidence indicates is probably a well-organized gang (or gangs) of hate terrorists operating in several States. Florida officials in particular forecast that a Federal antibombings statute would not be the signal for the slackening off in local police efforts but would instead initiate the kind of coordinated action by Federal, State and city authorities most apt to result in the most effective police work.

In the one instance where the FBI did move in at once, after the bombing of a Temple in Atlanta last October, a group of suspects were speedily rounded up and indicted for the crime.

Seldom have we—speaking for Senator KEATING and myself—examined an emergency situation which so urgently requires Federal legislation to help remedy it. Local law enforcement agencies have for the most part been unable to apprehend or convict the hate bombers or check the flood of hate mail inciting to violence which together have created a climate of severe tension in certain southern communities.

The dimensions of the damage wrought by the dynamiting of private homes, schools, houses of worship, community centers and places of business in several States take us beyond an obvious attempt at mass intimidation of minority groups. The terrorists responsible are assaulting a doctrine essential to the preservation of our democratic society, the maintenance of law and order to which the overwhelming majority of Americans, regardless of individual differences on civil rights, are genuinely devoted.

I close with the statement that we believe that the comprehensive legislation we are introducing in cosponsorship with so many Senate colleagues will help to more effectively curb the activities of fanatics and racists trying to establish a reign of terror, particularly in communities where official resistance to court orders on desegregation of the public schools tend to invite other acts of lawlessness. In our opinion, our group of seven bills will achieve that objective without infringing upon our traditional freedoms of speech and press or the essential responsibilities and jurisdiction of local law enforcement officials.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills will be received and appropriately referred.

The bills, introduced by Mr. JAVITS (for himself and other Senators), were received, read twice by their titles, and referred, as indicated:

To the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. 120. A bill to make unlawful the transmission in interstate commerce of certain communications with intent to interfere with the execution of Federal or State statutes or court decrees;

S. 121. A bill to make unlawful the mailing of threatening communications with intent to interfere with the execution of Federal or State statutes or court decrees;

S. 122. A bill to make unlawful mailing of matter tending to incite crimes of violence;

S. 123 A bill to amend title 18 of the U.S. Code relating to threats or injury to Federal officers in the discharge of their duties; and

S. 124. A bill to make unlawful interstate travel to avoid prosecution for willful destruction or damaging of any building.

To the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service:

S. 125. A bill to authorize the exclusion from the mails of matter relating to the solicitation of funds for, and the distribution of information relating to certain unlawful activities.

OLD-AGE AND SURVIVORS INSURANCE BENEFITS—INCREASE OF EXEMPTIONS FOR INCOME TAX PURPOSES

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, two bills. The first bill would permit all citizens to receive at least minimum old-age and survivors insurance benefits. The second bill would enable all citizens an increase in individual exemptions for income tax purposes.

From time to time, I shall introduce new bills as well as reintroduce other bills into the Senate which were introduced by me in the 85th Congress but which were not enacted into law. It is my hope that the 86th Congress will look favorably upon these bills which benefit many people throughout the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills will be received and appropriately referred.

The bills, introduced by Mr. LANGER, were received, read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

S. 126. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to permit all citizens of the United States to receive at least minimum old-age and survivors insurance benefits; and

S. 127. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code so as to increase the individual exemption for income tax purposes from $600 to $1,000.

AMENDMENT OF REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 2 OF 1953

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953. I ask unanimous consent that this bill lie over on the desk until the close of business on Monday, January 12, in order to permit the addition of names of other cosponsors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Minnesota.

The bill (S. 144) to amend Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953, introduced by Mr. HUMPHREY (for himself and Mr. MANSFIELD), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Government Operations.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an explanatory statement of the bill, prepared by me, may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The explanatory statement presented by Mr. HUMPHREY is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HUMPHREY

I am introducing on behalf of myself and Senator MANSFIELD, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953 so that hereafter section 1 of the plan will no longer apply to the Rural Electrification Administration. The bill also specifies that the approval or denial of REA loans will be the sole responsibility of the REA Administrator, regardless of the provisions of any other law.

The bill provides for the transfer to the Administrator of REA all functions which were transferred from the Administrator to the Secretary of Agriculture under Reorganization Plan No. 2 or any other reorganization plan or law.

Many of the Senators will remember that I introduced a similar bill in the last Congress. Extensive hearings were held on it by the Subcommittee on Reorganization of the Committee on Government Operations. No formal action was taken, but the hearings convinced me, and I believe a number of other Senators, that this legislation is vital to the continued stability and progress of the rural electrification program.

I think the hearings clearly proved that the Secretary of Agriculture has reduced the REA Administrator to nothing more than a good will ambassador. The REA Administrator can no longer make important loans on his own initiative; before he can sign a loan for more than $500,000 he has to send it over to the Secretary's office for review.

The making of loans is supposed to be the major duty of the REA Administrator. That is why his position exists—why REA itself exists. Loans are supposed to be made if they come within the law and if they meet REA's standards of feasibility. Certainly they are not supposed to be influenced in any way by political considerations.

Congress made sure of this, or thought it did, when REA was established. The REA Administrator is appointed for a 10-year term. He must be confirmed by the U.S. Senate. The law throws what should be a cloak of political immunity around him, so that he will not be tempted to let political philosophies influence his decisions on loan applications.

Under this concept, the rural electrification program has been an enormous success. Today, more than 95 percent of our rural homes and institutions have been electrified. I know of no other Government program that has done so much good for so many people. I know of no other lending program, public or private, that can match the fantastic repayment record of the REA borrowers.

A shadow has fallen on this great program. The REA Administrator is no longer his own man. He no longer can judge an important loan application on its merits and make the loan himself if it should be made.

We discovered in 1957 that the REA Administrator had been ordred to check loans of more than $500,000 with Kenneth Scott, Director of Agricultural Credit Services. Mr. Scott is appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture. He has no fixed tenure, and he is not confirmed by the Senate.

I submit that there can only be one reason for having loans reviewed in the Secretary's office. They are sent there to pass some sort of political or philosophical test. There is just no other explanation.

The only loans which go to Mr. Scott are those which the professional staff at REA have thoroughly checked and approved. They are the loans which the Administrator would be expected to sign. They have been approved by the legal division, the engineering division, and all the others that are involved in the loan procedure. They are certified to be within the law and to be feasible.

Why should some top political figure in the Department of Agriculture review such loans? Why should he pass on them? If he makes a thorough technical review, then I submit it is the clearest example of government waste and duplicity I have ever come across.

But he does not make a technical review. He checks to see whether the loans fit the philosophy of the administration. There is no other answer, and I think that practice poses a real threat to the rural electrification program. I would think the same thing if we had a Democratic administration or any other kind of administration.

I am not saying that this practice has resulted in any great abuses to date. My point is that as a matter of principle the decision on REA loans should be made by the Administrator who by law is free from political pressure and philosophy.

Reorganization Plan No. 2 gave the Secretary of Agriculture broad powers to redistribute the functions of the agencies in the Department. Secretary Benson told our subcommittee at the time we were considering this plan that he would make no major changes without consulting the Congress and interested individuals and associations. He told us this repeatedly, and on these assurances, we gave our approval to the plan. But he did not carry out this pledge when he took away the major loanmaking authority of the REA Administrator—and if that action was not a major change then I don't know that a major change would be.

This bill is designed to restore the full loanmaking authority of the REA Administrator. It makes sure that the Administrator, and he alone, has final authority for making or rejecting an individual loan. The bill does not take REA out of the Department of Agriculture. It does not make REA an independent agency. The Department of Agriculture will still have full policy control over REA, but not over individual loans.

I think the record will show that I have consistently supported reorganization proposals in the past, under this administration and the one which preceded it. When we received the assurances of Secretary Benson, I supported Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953.

Since those assurances were not carried out I feel no obligation to continue to support that plan insofar as it applies to REA.

This proposed legislation has the enthusiastic support of rural electric people throughout the country. It was unanimously approved by the 6,000 people who attended the annual meeting of the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association last year. Last fall, after the 85th Congress had adjourned, all 10 of the regional meetings of NRECA unanimously passed resolutions to support this legislation in this Congress.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I ask unanimous consent that a resolution adopted at the region VI meeting in Bismarck, S. Dak., on October 28, 1958, may be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

I also ask unanimous consent that this bill lie on the desk until the close of business on Monday, January 12, in order to permit the addition of names of other cosponsors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection the resolution will be printed in the RECORD, and the bill will lie on the table, as requested by the Senator from Minnesota.

The resolution is as follows:

RESOLUTION ADOPTED AT REGION VI MEETING OF NATIONAL RURAL ELECTRIC COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION

REA REORGANIZATION

Whereas the original REA Act of 1936 provided for strictly nonpartisan administration of REA and provided for the appointment of an Administrator by the President, with confirmation by the Senate for a 10-year term to insure nonpartisan, nonpolitical administration; and

Whereas Secretary of Agriculture, Ezra Taft Benson, pledged himself to a congressional committee to make no changes in REA without first consulting the proper congressional committees and other interested groups; and

Whereas, in June 1957, the Secretary did reorganize REA by requiring that all loans of $500,000 or more, and that all loans of whatever amount, to new borrowers, be reviewed by the Secretary's office; and

Whereas Secretary Benson has supported a bill in Congress which would drastically increase interest rates and drive electric and telephone cooperatives to Wall Street for their financing: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we are vigorously opposed to any reorganization of REA; and be it further

Resolved, That as soon as the new Congress convenes in 1959 a bill identical or similar to the Humphrey-Price bill of 1953, which would restore to the REA Administrator all of the functions and authority vested in him by the original act of 1936, be introduced and passed.

AMENDMENT OF WATERSHED PROTECTION AND FLOOD PREVENTION ACT

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and my colleague, the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Watershed Protection and Flood Prevention Act to provide that its loan provisions shall be applicable to certain other projects. I ask unanimous consent that a statement by me relating to a similar bill introduced by me in the 85th Congress, and appearing at page 4181 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 153) to amend the Watershed Protection and Flood Prevention Act to provide that its loan provisions shall be applicable to certain other projects, introduced by Mr. KERR (for himself and Mr. MONRONEY), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The statement presented by Mr. KERR is as follows:

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and my colleague, the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Watershed Protection and Flood Prevention Act to provide that its loan provisions shall be applicable to certain other projects.

This bill, if enacted, would amend Public Law 566, 83d Congress, as amended by Public Law 1018, 84th Congress. The purpose of the amendment is to extend the authorization of loans contained in Public Law 1018 to 11 watershed projects authorized under section 13 of the Flood Control Act of 1944.

Construction of watershed works of improvement in these 11 projects has been under way for a period of 10 years. They are generally identical in character to the types of improvements provided for in Public Law 566, as amended. The 11 watersheds include a total of about 30 million acres in New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, Georgia, Mississippi, Oklahoma, Texas, Iowa, and California.

Because the programs in these 11 watersheds were already authorized, the Department has not accepted applications for assistance within their boundaries under the provisions of Public Law 566, as amended. The only form of assistance not available in these 11 watersheds which can be obtained under authority of Public Law 566, as amended, is the securing of Federal loans under the provisions of section 8 of Public Law 566, as amended.

The purpose of the bill is to further amend Public Law 566 to make the provisions of section 8 applicable to the 11 watersheds authorized in the Flood Control Act of 1944 in the same manner as it is applicable to all projects originated under Public Law 566 throughout the remainder of the United States.

EVALUATION OF RECREATIONAL BENEFITS FROM CONSTRUCTION OF CERTAIN WORKS OF IMPROVEMENT

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE], and my colleague, the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to make the evaluation of recreational benefits resulting from the construction of any flood-control, navigation, or reclamation project an integral part of project planning, and for other purposes. I ask unanimous consent that a statement prepared by me on February 11, 1957, relating to this subject matter may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 159) to make the evaluation of recreational benefits resulting from the construction of any flood-control, navigation, or reclamation project an integral part of project planning, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. KERR (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Works.

The statement presented by Mr. KERR is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR KERR

Federal water projects have become a major portion of the playgrounds for the Nation. I believe it is time that the Federal law recognizes the great economic value of these recreation benefits and increases the opportunity for their development.

Under present law, the value of the recreation benefits expected from water projects cannot be counted in computing the economic justification. Furthermore, there is insufficient provision for a full development of recreation opportunities to insure wider usage and more economic benefits to the areas.

Senator MONRONEY and I are, therefore, today introducing new legislation to correct this situation. The only limitation will be that the recreation program does not conflict with the major purposes of the project, such as flood control, power, etc. The general result will be to speed authorization and construction of projects with recreational opportunities, and to improve such facilities of those projects already in operation.

The primary purpose of the bill is to improve the benefit-cost ratio by counting potential recreation benefits up to 15 percent of the total cost of the project. This portion would not be repaid to the Federal Government by users. Such benefits would be computed on the basis of $1 per person on the estimated number of visitors annually, a figure obviously much less than experience proves would be fed into the local economy by the booming tourist trade.

Our bill would allow and encourage full cooperation and coordination of all agencies, local, State and Federal, to promote the maximum development and usage of recreation facilities. It covers the projects built both by the Corps of Army Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation.

This proposal to recognize officially recreation benefits has been endorsed by the Chief of the Corps of Army Engineers. He recently cited the tremendous popularity of the lake projects, and indicated the need of new and clarifying legislation.

The proven value and popularity of these great projects demonstrate the logic and necessity of recognizing recreation as an important benefit.

For instance, in 1955, there was a total of 62 million visitors at the Army Engineers projects, which was more than the combined total at all national parks, and many, many more than the total visiting national forests.

Last summer, there were 64,000 boats licensed for operation on the Army Engineer reservoirs, with the number growing at a rapid rate. Water skiing in the land-locked Middle West has become a booming fad.

In our own Oklahoma, there were about 13.5 million visitors reported at our 9 big lakes, including about 6.6 million at Lake Texoma. Already, the tourist business is feeding millions of dollars annually into our economy, and the increase of population, with the increase of leisure time, is calculated to multiply this total many times in the future.

Senator MONRONEY, of Oklahoma, is cosponsoring this bill with me in the Senate, and a companion bill is being introduced in the House by Representatives CARL ALBERT and ED EDMONDSON, of Oklahoma.

We have spent many months in conference on this bill, working with representatives of State and local agencies, and the Federal agencies affected. We believe it is adequate and satisfactory. It will greatly strengthen our soil and water program, provide better recreation facilities for the people, and spur the economy where the projects are located.

COMMISSION TO STUDY PROBLEMS OF ALCOHOLISM

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a joint resolution, the purpose of which is to establish a commission to study the problem of alcoholism in the United States and to make recommendations for the more adequate provision of facilities for the treatment, rehabilitation, cure of alcoholics, and for the prevention of alcoholism.

I conducted an intense personal study into alcoholic problems which entailed the examination of records and statistics furnished me by nearly every State in the Nation and also information provided by doctors, industries, and other organizations such as Alcoholics Anonymous which are working on this problem.

I have prepared a statement in support of this resolution which incorporates generally facts on alcoholism and what it is costing America in broken homes, broken lives, dollars and cents, and which, I think, clearly demonstrates that alcoholism is a cancer on our spirit.

At this time I would like to thank the Governors and alcoholism commissions of the various States which assisted me in compiling facts on the effects of alcoholism in this country. I have retained this information and I shall gladly make this material available to the committee of the Senate to which my resolution may be referred for appropriate action.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed along with my remarks a statement in support of the joint resolution on alcoholism.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 1) to establish a Commission to study the problem of alcoholism in the United States and to make recommendations for the more adequate provision of facilities for the treatment, rehabilitation, and cure of alcoholics, and for the prevention of alcoholism, introduced by Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

The statement presented by Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina is as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR JOHNSTON

One of the major problems confronting modern society is alcoholism.

This addictive disease accounts for an almost countless number of woes: it makes life a living hell for more than 5 million Americans and their families. It is a disease which brings pain, mental, financial, and physical suffering to victims, causes personality breakdowns, broken homes, high divorce rates, delinquency, adult and juvenile, crimes of various sorts, an appalling toll of accidents, industrial and traffic, serious financial loss to business and industry. Not the least ill desired byproduct of alcoholism is the corrosion of morale it brings to substantial segments of the population and the yet undetermined physical damage to human minds and bodies. Alcoholism, in short, is a problem of great national concern.

Alcoholism is not a new problem to man. It has been with civilization for centuries. For a long, long time it has been a serious problem. But only in recent years has it been recognized as a disease. We know now the alcoholic should not be treated with social shame, but as one who is ill with a disease. In the opinion of many experts in the field of alcoholism, the changed public attitude toward the alcoholic is one of the major gains of the past several decades.

Compassion rather than condemnation must be the keynote in dealing with alcoholics. It is with this view that I address myself to the challenging problem of alcoholism. It was with the thought that we can further the good work already being done by the several States and others in this vital field by developing national interest and providing leadership and auxiliary help that I undertook a comprehensive survey and study of this whole problem.

The results indicate to me and others that a challenging task confronts us in the extension of activity to deal with alcoholism. In the areas of education, prevention, treatment, and rehabilitation, much remains to be done despite the excellent efforts of the several States in their respective programs.

Before proceeding with the presentation of the material recruited in my study of alcoholism, I am pleased to acknowledge the very splendid cooperation of the governors of the several States as well as the respective directors of the various State commissions on alcoholism. I have had a most hearty and prompt response from those officials in my request for information on what their States are doing for the treatment and prevention of alcoholism. I also want to record my thanks to the many private and public organizations that have given their wholehearted and valuable cooperation.

An impressive volume of achievement has been realized over the country in programs on alcoholism. It is readily apparent from the encouraging results through the Nation that the attitude of the public, the medical fraternity and Government has taken a tremendous change for the better.

Most encouraging is the realization that something worthwhile in the way of a cure can be effected, that individuals can be reclaimed from the rubble heap and brought back to sound health, self-respect, and useful places in society. The work of Alcoholics Anonymous has been most effective in this field—the activities of this group is a saga of understanding, tolerance, helpful support and practical therapy. It is most heartening to read the accomplishments of Alcoholics Anonymous and it is all the more noteworthy because the work was started originally by two men who had been addicted to drinking. From this humble, spontaneous operation Alcoholics Anonymous has spread to a nationwide organization which commands the voluntary, inspired services of thousands of men and women who have been fellow sufferers.

Giving credit to all the pioneers in the field of alcoholism, public officials, lay men and women, and members of the medical profession, social workers and others, I am of the opinion, based on my studies, that despite the vast amount of good that has been accomplished, the surface really has been only scratched. Present programs in many States are the beginnings of what hold the promise of real achievement. In State after State, the start has been made and the course has been charted. But facilities, personnel, and funds are at a bare minimum. The foundation is here upon which we can build the pillars of solid achievement to universally overcome alcoholism.

A significant aspect of the reclamation work being done on alcoholics in the several States is the genuine enthusiasm with which the work has been undertaken. As I remarked earlier, we have come a far way in our thinking on alcoholism in the past 20 years. And this is one of the most promising things about the whole problem, for the alcoholic is a super-sensitive person, quick to detect hostility, just as he responds to kindness that respects him as a person and attributes to him the dignity which he has largely forfeited. As Dr. Selden D. Bacon, Ph.D., an expert in the field, states: "The greatest number of clients (alcoholics) are lost at the diagnostic interview."

It has been well said that "alcoholics are not drinkers—they are compulsive consumers of alcohol." This is the considered opinion of Dr. Bacon. Actually, in the consideration of the subject of alcoholism we must realize that for millions of Americans social drinking is no problem. Dr. Bacon points this out in the following words: "It should be noted that the use of alcohol is not alcoholic for more than 60 million of the 65 million drinkers of this country." We do well to keep this fact in mind as we proceed with our consideration of this problem. Otherwise, we are going to build walls of resentment that will militate against an overall effective program on rehabilitation of alcoholics. Public understanding, public cooperation are essential to spur the rehabilitation activities now underway in the Nation to the goal of impressive accomplishment.

My purpose is not to present something that will gobble up the various State programs on alcoholism. To the contrary, I propose by a centralized review, a fair appraisal, the suggestion of fairly uniform standards and the providing of assistance in research and leadership to strengthen and give encouragement to those who are already valiantly progressing this good work. It is my hope that in this way we can lend moral support, guidance, and supplement the work of the several States which see the greater need but are not able to go all the way because of their limited resources. National attention for the several programs would be most helpful, additional research, as I have said, the amplification of the literature of the subject and a wider educational program—all of these would aid the cause.

It is an interesting fact that since the first State study of alcoholism was set up in Oregon in 1943 all but 6 of the 48 States have given recognition in some kind of legislation that alcoholism is a public health problem. Of further interest is the fact that 33 States and the District of Columbia have enacted enabling legislation providing for State-sponsored treatment, research and/or educational programs. In three States, action has been taken to admit alcoholics to certain State institutions. At the end of 1956, two additional States, Illinois and Iowa, had appointed study commissions to review the problem with a view toward recommending suitable legislation.

According to the American Medical Association, which is giving increased attention to the problem of alcoholism, one quarter of all the hospitals in the country treat alcoholics routinely. An encouraging growth of recognition of the disease nature of alcoholism is that the Blue Cross and Blue Shield insurance plans as well as a number of other commercial insurance companies are accepting alcoholics as beneficiaries.

The statistics on alcoholics and alcoholism are rather appalling and I propose to submit a number of them in certain essential categories for information. At the same time I hasten with the reminder that the extent and scope of the problem must not blind us to the possibilities and the accomplishments in rehabilitation.

Dr. Marvin A. Block, chairman of the Committee on Alcoholism of the Council on Mental Health, American Medical Association, is authority for the statement that the annual cost of accidents due to alcoholism is $125 million, while the annual cost of alcoholics in mental hospitals is $30 million, and the annual cost of alcoholics in penal institutions is $25 million. Dr. Block also presents the further impressive figures that the sum of $40 million is spent annually by public and private agencies for the care of families of alcoholics, $20 million by the public agencies and another $20 million by the private agencies.

In the opinion of Raymond G. McCarthy and Edgar M. Douglass in an informed article in the Journal of Studies in Alcohol, Inc., entitled "Alcohol and Social Responsibilities," the information is furnished that "alcoholism costs society more than $1 billion ($1,168,354,750) according to an estimate for the single year 1946." Later figures, I am certain, will revise even this large cost upward.

On the economic front we further find, according to Harrison M. Trice, of the New York State School of Industrial Labor Relations, of Cornell University, that "on the average, 3 percent of the work force are problem drinkers." In "Problem Drinking," by Henderson and Bacon, dealing with the findings of the Yale plan for business and industry, it is set forth that "the alcoholic loses an average of 22 working days each year from alcoholism alone." The same source also claims that "alcoholics lose a total of over 36 million working days each year." It is likewise claimed by their authorities that "the alcoholic's lifespan is 12 years less than that of the nonalcoholic."

The annual loss in wages alone because of excessive drinking is $432 million, according to Benson Y. Landis, in Public Affairs Committee Pamphlet No. 118, published in 1946.

It is an interesting fact that the public has the image of an alcoholic as a visible Skid Row type. As a matter of an educated estimate by Robert Straus, Ph. D., professor of medical sociology, Medical Center, University of Kentucky, "the remaining 85 to 90 percent (alcoholics) are to be found in homes, offices, places of business, in every walk of life, apparently trying to lead normal lives."

The scope of this problem is realized in the statement that: "Seven million adult Americans are 'heavy, addictive drinkers'; and the number is increasing at the rate of 250,000 a year. One in nine Americans is destined to become an alcoholic * * * the great difficulty now is that the young people are not being told the complete and scientific facts of this problem." This is the opinion of Dr. Andrew C. Ivy, chairman of the Institute of Scientific Studies for Prevention of Alcoholism, Loma Linde, Calif. I am sure the religious and school and social leaders of any American community can confirm this fact.

Consider these dismally impressive statistics from the National Safety Council in the category of alcoholism and fatal driving accidents:

Twenty-two out of every 100 had been drinking; over the Christmas holidays, the percentage jumped to 55 percent; over the Labor Day holiday, the total was 48 percent.

In like manner, the percentage was high in the number of pedestrians who had figured in fatal automobile accidents. Out of every 100 persons so involved, 22 had been drinking.

These statistics are all the most discouraging in view of the intensive educational and warning campaign put on by the American Automobile Association on the eve of the holidays.

The National Council on Alcoholism in a special report to the National Institute of Mental Health states that Dr. Leo Bartemeier reported that a recent Gallup poll showed 14 percent of families interviewed were found to have some problem regarding drinking.

This finding shows the corrosive penetration of alcoholism into the American home, into our contemporary civilization.

Each alcoholic is an individual with individual problems. One responds to one set of stimuli, one to another. Dr. Bacon states: "Rehabilitation may start in the jail, in the home, in a hospital, even on the street corner. It is important to remember, however, that wherever it starts it must continue in and be oriented to the individual's ordinary life situation."

What is the goal of rehabilitation? Again, according to Dr. Bacon, "the Connecticut Commission on Alcoholism (which I might add parenthetically is among the leaders in the field) has stated its goal in rehabilitation to be the return of the individual—more acceptable to himself, increasingly independent, and not using alcohol—to the community in which he should be an accepted member. The commission believes that there are varying degrees of success in rehabilitation and that cases should be followed at least 3 years."

Let us not delude ourselves that the disease of alcoholism is a simple one. It is not just the problem of overconsumption of alcohol. Just what strange motivations prompt a man, a woman or a teen-ager to blot out consciousness in a drunken stupor is something to puzzle the experts. Dr. Sidney Vogel, engaged in the private practice of psychiatry and a member of the National Council of Alcoholism makes this pertinent contribution:

"Treatment of the alcoholic is not the sole province of the psychiatrist, internist, endocrinologist, sociologist, minister, or any one scientific or lay discipline. Recognition of this is fundamental. A total 'push' and mobilization of all methods and facilities is necessary to improve results and make help available to more alcoholics.

"We must not follow in the footsteps of the six blind sages of Hindustan who on touching an elephant described him variously as a fan, a rope, a snake, a tree, a spear, and a wall. Rather we must coordinate and synthesize psychiatric, biological and sociological research and knowledge to understand and master the problem of alcoholism. Only with this newfound knowledge will further inroads be made on this widespread and devastating disease."

In like vein, Corwin states: "Best informed modern opinion calls for the appliance to the problem of alcoholism of all such available research techniques as have been used in the study of other serious individual afflictions. This can best be done in medical institutions such as hospitals and clinics where all the resources of modern medicine and psychiatry can be utilized to contribute toward the understanding of the causes of uncontrolled drinking and the nature of its developmental process. Only in such well-equipped surroundings can adequate therapeutic and rehabilitative techniques be devised and methods for the prevention of the disorder developed."

The involuntary commitment of alcoholics to suitable places of treatment and cure has some supporters among those who have made a study of alocoholism. One such is Dr. Melvin L. Selzer, psychiatrist at the University of Michigan's Department of Mental Hygiene. Dr. Selzer is convinced the alcoholic will not admit to his drinking or invoke voluntary treatment, hence something has to be done about compelling treatment. He states:

"State laws regarding commitment for uncomplicated alcoholism are inadequate or nonexistent. Many States still require evidence of psychosis before committing alcoholics, a rather archaic approach since it implies that only far advanced cases will be considered for treatment * * * courts tend to commit only persons who are called to their attention by obnoxious behavior. Without enforced commitment and treatment, it is safe to say that the bulk of the alcoholic population will remain alcoholic most or all of their shortened lives."

Dr. Selzer insists that psychiatrists and public officials gradually are acknowledging the futility of the efforts to rehabilitate alcoholics without some method of enforcing an initial period of abstinence and therapy.

Dr. Selzer adds the additional point that "alcoholism is malignant." He states that about 65 percent of the unobtrusive alcoholics die between the ages of 35 and 39. He adds that enforced treatment pioneered in North Carolina and Michigan hospitals indicates a sufficiently high percentage of rehabilitation—up to 40 percent or better—to make the procedure worthwhile.

"The alcoholics received very little specific treatment other than supportive psychotherapy, reassurance, medical treatment if they are ill, an opportunity to keep occupied and a period of time to discover that sobriety was not a threat to their existence. A period of sobriety is essential for these individuals to learn that they can handle their anxieties without alcohol—an important fact that they may never discover if a bottle can be readily obtained, or if they can desert the hospital at will."

It is an interesting aspect of this whole problem that 9 out of 10 alcoholics cannot be detected as such other than by their families or close friends and intimate associates. The alcoholic in many instances possesses real talent for secret drinking, for covering up. Many an individual the public respected as an outstanding person has been addicted to secret, heavy drinking. This frequently happens with women who are given to lone drinking in the home. Only about 10 percent of alcoholics are of the identifiable "skid-row" type.

"The ability of the alcohol addict to conceal his excessive drinking is well documented," Dr. Selzer states. "They learn to drink quickly and silently with a minimum of activity afterwards so as not to betray themselves by clumsy motions or slurred speech. Driving is usually avoided since this may readily call their attention to their inebriety."

In an excellent article on alcoholism in the Washington Sunday Star of May 11, 1958, Phil Yeager and John Stark, in discussing Dr. Selzer's views and findings, quoted Dr. Selzer's apt example of the quiet drinker covering up in the following language:

"Dr. Selzer quotes this passage from Betty Smith's 'A Tree Grows in Brooklyn' as a penetrating observation of the camouflage employed by the majority of alcoholics today:

" 'Francie got to know when (her father) was drinking more than usual. He walked straight coming home. He walked carefully and slightly sidewise. When he was drunk, he was a quiet man. He didn't brawl, he didn't sing, he didn't grow sentimental. He grew thoughtful. People who didn't know him thought he was drunk when he was sober because he was full of song and excitement. When he was drunk, strangers looked on him as a quiet, thoughtful man who minded his own business.' "

This is a masterly treatment of the addictive drinker—the character portrayed so ably has many thousands of counterparts throughout the country today.

All of us know the part alcoholism plays in that scourge of society—the broken home. Let us look then to the views of an expert in juvenile delinquency, Dr. John Otto Reinemann, director of probation for the municipal court in Philadelphia. Dr. Reinemann states that broken homes are the leading cause of juvenile delinquency. "Sociologists and psychologists agree that such a broken home is one of the most significant factors contributing to juvenile misbehavior and delinquency. Girls seem to be even more affected than boys by the lack of normal family life, as evidenced by the fact that only 29 percent of all delinquent girls live in their own family home with both natural parents."

The parents, who through overindulgence in alcohol, cause a home to be broken sets in motion a chain reaction of antisocial activities that frequently roll up to a costly toll of violence.

In connection with this aspect of the problem of alcoholism, it is worthy of note that the latest figures from the Federal Bureau of Investigation reveal that juvenile arrests in 1,220 cities throughout the United States increased by the high figure of 9.8 percent. Consider the fact that the FBI concluded that youths under 18 years of age accounted for 12.3 percent of the overall arrest increase of 4.3 percent. The statistics show the juveniles committing the startling total of 67.6 percent of auto thefts, 54.8 percent of burglaries and 51.3 percent of larcenies. Also juveniles committed 9 percent of aggravated assaults and 6 percent of the murders. Major crimes committed during the year amounted to 2,796,400, an increase of 9.1 percent over 1956 and 23.9 percent over the average for the last 5 years. City crimes rose 9 percent and rural offenses 11 percent.

Holding this mirror up to the face of society does not produce a very pleasing reflection. It is not my intent or purpose to endeavor to tax alcoholics with this total of crime, but there is a very definite and substantial relationship, as we have shown, between alcoholism and broken homes and juvenile delinquency and crime. The newspapers these days only too frequently carry distressing stories of the latter-day offender, the direct perpetrator of crime, the juvenile, under the influence of alcohol, who strikes out in violence, usually upon any innocent person who has the misfortune to cross his path at the moment he wants to wreak his revenge upon society.

This raises the obvious question: Is alcoholism inherited? In the booklet, "Facts and Fancies About Alcoholism," by Helena H. Shea, of the Rhode Island State Division of Alcoholism, there is this interesting answer to this question: "As yet there is not much reason to believe that the tendency toward compulsive drinking is inherited from the parents, but alcoholic parents tend to have more alcoholic children than nondrinking parents do. Also, children tend to imitate their elders, and in a family upset by alcoholism there will be more instability, more maladjustment, and more drinking than in a normal family group. However, since science has not ruled out the physical causes, it is possible that a constitutional factor may be responsible, at least to some extent, for a psychological craving for drink."

What one of us does not cringe when we see the wrecks in human form barely able to beg for a pittance so they can buy something more with alcohol in it to blot out reality? These are the living without hope; these are the truly dead, they who trod the streets of forgotten men; they are the wound stripes of our civilization.

We haye seen men in their animal cravings drinking "smoke," the diabolical concoction of the "jungle." We have seen addicts resort to the desperate expedient of consuming radiator alcohol. We have seen them embrace slow suicide in liquid mixtures that four-legged animals would repulse.

Who knows what dark motivations cause men, born in the image and likeness of God, to do such degrading harm to themselves? What gushing springs of self-pity are at work drowning the self-respect of individuals when they literally sink in a sea of alcohol. What real or fancied wrongs have caused them to indulge in such spiritual and physical lacerations? Where along the line has the damage been done to their healthy ego-strengths? What was the first step that caused this headlong plunge down the ladder of self-debasement? What hidden guilts goad the alcoholic into despair?

What a vista of enriching exploration beckons in this troubled and challenging disease of alcoholism. What an opportunity presents itself to our society to go forward in research, armed with charity, equipped with compassion and tolerance, with kindness and a sense of fellowship as members of the human race, to get the answers that will light the way of hope for curing this dread disease.

From the viewpoint of the public's interest in the problem of alcoholism, the case is simply and well put in the following words by Dr. Anthony Zappla, Director of the Alcoholic Rehabilitation Program Clinic in the Department of Public Health, District of Columbia:

"The community loses in many ways when it has disabled persons among its residents. An alcoholic is handicapped because of his behavior, which is often unacceptable to the community. His illness makes him nonproductive during many of his working hours. In the long run a community will gain by working to prevent alcoholism before the excessive drinker has reached an advanced stage of the illness and, where alcoholism exists, by bringing the alcoholic back to productivity and usefulness."

In this vein there is an excellent statement of the problem in the 1957 edition of the booklet published by the Licensed Beverage Industries, Inc., entitled: "Programs on Alcoholism Research, Treatment and Rehabilitation in the United States and Canada." In its introduction, the organization states: "A public health problem may be defined as any problem affecting the health and well-being, directly or indirectly, of people, the solution of which is attainable through organized community efforts. Within this framework alcoholism is a public health problem. During the past two decades, by this definition, it has proved to be amenable to solution through group effort." It further states—"The recognition in recent years that alcoholism was a disease amenable to treatment in public understanding and action concerning this problem marked the beginning of a new era. Public action in the form of State medical care, research and treatment programs were an inevitable and predictable consequence."

From the studies of the Licensed Beverages Industries, Inc., we learned that the sum of $4 million was allocated by the States for programs on alcoholism in 1956. These moneys were divided on the following basis: 14 percent for research; 9 percent for education; 13 percent for administration; 3 percent for other purposes; and 61 percent for treatment. In 1956, a total of 22,906 were treated in State operated or supported treatment facilities, hospitals or clinics.

Thus we can see that already a fine start has been made in this troubled field. Of course, as I stated before, many of the State programs are marginal, are the beginnings, represent, in fact, what may be properly termed pilot programs. But from them considerable has been learned, valuable experience has been reaped, standards are being established, and the road for future progress well marked with directional signs.

Alcoholics Anonymous has a total of 6,859 groups, so-called. Of these, 4,755 are in the United States and 706 in Canada. In other parts of the world, excluding the United States and Canada, there are an additional 790 groups. They have 287 groups affiliated with hospitals, and 321 groups serving with correctional institutions. Then there is a classification known as "loners." These represent several hundred men and women living in isolated areas throughout the world (or in areas where it has not been possible to form a local group) are registered at general service headquarters as lone members. They correspond with headquarters and with their counterparts in others sections of the world. It is stated of them by the national organization: "in a number of cases, notably in U.S. military installations overseas, loners have been responsible for establishing local groups."

Another interesting development of the A.A idea is the group of international seamen. This includes about 150 persons, including a handful of women, in naval service or the merchant marines. They correspond with each other and have been responsible for starting and encouraging local A.A. groups in many foreign ports.

The recognition of alcoholism as a medical responsibility is gaining new adherents each passing year. There is a significant increase in the number of hospitals that are admitting alcoholics, including the out-patient departments. The American Medical Association's Council on Mental Health reports on the aspect of alcoholism as a medical problem as follows:

"1. Alcoholic symptomatology and complications which occur in many personality disorders come within the scope of medical practice.

"2. Acute alcoholic intoxication can be and often is a medical emergency. As with any other acute case, the merits of each individual case should be considered at the time of the emergency.

"3. The type of alcoholic patient admitted to a general hospital should be judged on his individual merits, consideration being given to the attending physician's opinion, cooperation of the patient, and his behavior at the time of admission. The admitting doctors should then examine the patient and determine from the history and his actions whether he should be admitted or refused.

"4. In order to offer house officers well-rounded training in the general hospital, there should be adequate facilities available as part of the hospital program for care of alcoholics. Since the house officer in a hospital will eventually come in contact with this type of patient in practice, his training in treating this illness should come while he is a resident officer. Hospital staffs should be urged to accept patients for treatment and cooperate in this program.

"5. With improved means of treatment available and the changed viewpoint which places the alcoholic in the category of a sick individual, most of the problems formerly encountered in the treatment of an alcoholic in a general hospital have been greatly reduced. In any event, the individual patient should be evaluated rather than have general objection on the grounds of alcoholism.

"It is recognized that no general policy can be made for all hospitals. Administrators are urged to give careful consideration to the possibility of accepting such patients in the light of the newer available measures and the need for providing facilities for treating these patients. In order to render a service to the community, provision should be made for such patients who cooperate and who wish such care.

"In order to accomplish any degree of success with the problem of alcoholism, it is necessary that educational programs be enlarged, methods of case finding and follow-up be ascertained, research encouraged, and general education toward acceptance of these sick people be emphasized. The hospital and its administration occupy a unique position in the community which allows them great opportunities to contribute to the accomplishment of this purpose. It is urged that general hospitals and their administrators and their staffs give thought to meeting this responsibility."

This is impressive evidence of the increased medical and hospital interest in alcoholism, a most heartening development of the past several years.

Thus we can see progress being made on many fronts in the battle against alcoholism.

For a clue to an understanding of how deep-seated are the impulses which move the alcoholic, I would urge a reading of "Motivation of the Alcoholic for Recovery" by Dr. Lorant Forizs, from the March 1958, "Quarterly Journal of Studies on Alcohol."

I know of no better way to bring this whole matter into proper focus than to quote, in part, from the forword of the annals from which I have selected several of these expert articles. The section of the foreword I have chosen, you almost say as a text, reads as follows:

"Because alcoholism is an emergent condition stemming from chemical, physiological, psychological, and sociologic preconditions, because responses to alcoholism cut across every segment and institution of our society, and because the painful and destructive impact of the condition is not only extensive but is experienced and for generations has been experienced in almost every sector of our society, there is practically no subject relevant to American life which is not relevant to alcoholism."

No segment of American life is wholly free from the problem, directly or indirectly; somewhere it cuts across all our paths and so it has become a common responsibility and a challenge to all.

Let us not turn our backs on the fact that alcoholism has been a national scourge of such proportions in some countries that it has brought on a condition of decadence, followed by national decline. America, let it be noted, holds no monopoly on the problem. Alcoholism is no respecter of national boundaries—its realm is the world-at-large—it plys its damaging work in Africa and south of the Sahara as well as in our own rural areas and effete cafe society. Hollywood may get the headlines because of the antics of its celebrated addictive drinkers but lesser known victims around the globe are struggling with "the demon of the bottle" 'round-the-clock. The problem is not unknown to the United Nations. Human nature in its universality is the target of alcoholism.

It is with a keen sense of my limitations before this limitless subject, but propelled by the unremitting necessity to endeavor to do something constructive about it, that I have drawn up a resolution which, I fervently hope, will mark the beginning of an effort on a national scale to deal adequately with the problem of alcoholism.

The resolution was the logical outcome of my studies on this engrossing subject. I am encouraged to suggest this course of action because of the very splendid work the several States are doing in this field, as well as the outstanding programs of private organizations and agencies.

As I have remarked before, pioneers have broken the trail in this prior social jungle, the way has been marked, much has been accomplished—so much in fact that the Nation would be letting down the movement's pioneers if something were not done at the national level.

The resolution I have the privilege to present calls for the establishment of a commission, comprising members from the executive branch of the Government and the Congress and qualified professional people to make a complete and exhaustive study of alcoholism in all its forms and manifestations with a view to reporting back to the Congress its findings for appropriate action.

As I have indicated, the several States in their programs on alcoholism have pointed the way for future accomplishments. There is need, as I have shown, for education of the public of the true nature of alcoholism, for extended research, for facilities in which rehabilitation may be carried on.

I am satisfied that when such a commission is created and its findings have been brought in and the results made known, this body will be convinced that in authorizing this comprehensive study of alcoholism it will have done one of the most truly constructive and meritorious works in its distinguished history. It is my great hope that a concerted effort to bring the resources of our mighty country to grips with the problems of alcoholism will evolve and finally strike down this terrible cancer of the spirit.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO CONSTITUTION RELATING TO REAPPOINTMENT OR RECONFIRMATION OF JUSTICES OF U.S. COURTS

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a joint resolution which proposes an amendment to the U.S. Constitution to provide for the reappointment or reconfirmation each 6 years of justices and judges of the courts of the United States who are now appointed for life terms.

I have a few remarks to make to the Senate in support of this measure. First, I wish to state that there is a great need to halt the march of Federal courts, particularly the Supreme Court, into the legislative field of government. There must be a brake applied to the present trend in courts to supplant justice with psychology, sociology, and ideology. The men in our courts are more and more becoming modern witch doctors of sociology and psychology rather than dispensers of justice and supporters of law.

The most practical approach to this, in my opinion, is to make those who are now securely appointed for life, answerable to the people by means of recurring review. My proposed amendment to the Constitution would require these men to come up, every 6 years, on a staggered basis, so that the entire Court would not be in review at one time, for reappointment or reconfirmation.

Some may think this is a radical departure, but this course was seriously considered by able men who founded this Nation. No less than Thomas Jefferson, himself, strongly supported the position of periodical review of Federal judges and justices.

The first three articles of the Constitution of the United States establish the three respective branches of the tripartite system of Federal Government.

The first two of these articles provide for the legislative and the executive branches respectively, with the third providing for a Federal judicial system. It is noteworthy that while the first two articles are comparatively explicit in the definitions and limitations vested in both the executive and legislative branches, the third of these articles is far less explicit and describes the position and power of the judiciary in vague and general terms.

This article empowers the Congress to ordain and establish, as necessity may dictate, inferior courts within the Federal judiciary, defines the jurisdiction of the court both in its appellate and original aspects, and makes provision for the establishment of judgeships. It is in this latter provision, Mr. President, that we find the language of the article to be most vague, and it is from this vagueness that the uniquely independent and autonomous nature of the Federal judiciary has arisen. The amendment presently being introduced is designed to place, in effect, a limit upon the arbitrary and politically irresponsible behavior of the Federal courts.

In order to understand the existence of a governmental body within the present framework of the Federal system which operates outside the purview of public opinion, either directly or as manifest indirectly by the Congress, one must briefly examine some of the circumstances which surrounded the inception of the Federal judiciary system and attempt to examine these circumstances as they led to a relatively unlimited function of both the Supreme Court and its subsidiary tribunals.

The Federal Convention of 1787 which was called to formulate a Federal Constitution, drew upon many of the respective State constitutions for its inspiration. One of these State constitutions was that of Virginia. The provisions of this constitution were introduced in the Federal Convention of 1787 as the so-called "Virginia plan." This plan, similar to that of other States such as my native State, South Carolina, sets forth a tripartite system of government, with one of the branches being vested with judiciary power.

Mr. President, much debate centered about the means of procurement of judges, their responsibility to the Federal legislative body, and/or the Federal executive. The eventual outcome of these debates led to the now familiar phrasing of the third article which prescribes that "the judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior."

As Bates, Alfange, Beard, Smith, and other constitutional authorities have pointed out, the members of the Constitutional Convention, 55 in number, represented to a large extent the conservative interests of established wealth. The major interest of this body of men seems to have been to establish a judiciary which would act as an effective means of limitation or annulment upon the acts of a legislative branch composed of representatives of the popular will.

Having established such a judiciary body largely autonomous and unanswerable to any other authority, it would appear that the choice of justices and judges of such a judiciary system would be made from the ranks of those who reflected the interests of the wealthy conservatives of this era. The alleged necessity of an independent judiciary, that is, a judiciary relatively uninfluenced by political or other extraneous factors, was expounded by Hamilton and others in the Federalist Papers.

However, Hamilton seems to have adopted this attitude purely as a public position in order to placate elements within the population which would have demanded, in all probability, a judiciary system answerable to the will of the people or through their duly elected representatives. Hamilton's notorious contempt for the popular will belies the fact that he or other members of the group were essentially interested in establishing an unbiased, impartial judicial system for the administration of justice in an equitable manner for all the people.

The existence of such a body within a Democratic framework has continued to be a source of debate among constitutional scholars, legislators and jurists, as well as others.

Bound up inherently with the question of an independent judiciary is the concept of judicial review which had developed from an earlier decision rendered in England by Coke in the Bonham case in 1610, in which the famed English jurist asserted that "in many cases the common law will control acts of Parliament and sometimes adjudge them to be utterly void."

This concept of judicial review failed to gain a foothold in England. However, in Colonial America it gained popularity mainly because of its employment in two different sets of circumstances in this country. One of these circumstances consisted of instances wherein State courts had ruled upon the constitutionality of acts and laws of State legislative bodies. The second set of circumstances emanated from a court of appeals that existed as an institution from 1780 adjudicating the disposition of prizes captured at sea and other cases arising under international relations. Thusly, the doctrine of judicial review and its exercise by a Federal Supreme Court came into being.

Thus, Mr. President, the early years of the Supreme Court were devoted to a number of decisions pertinent to the present discussion—notably the Marbury against Madison case—which were attempts to define the proper jurisdiction and power of the Supreme Court. The judiciary act of 1789 had been the enabling act which provided for a Supreme Court and an inferior system of courts with territorial jurisdiction known as circuit and appeals courts.

This act, as Bates pointed out, gave the Supreme Court, by virtue of the theory of judicial review, practically unlimited powers of nullification over acts of Congress, decisions of State courts, and acts of State legislative bodies. In the early 1800's with the rise to power of the forerunner of the Democratic Party under the Presidency of Thomas Jefferson, there were a number of attempts to revitalize the whole question of judicial tenure and place such tenure or limitations thereof among the prerogatives of the legislative and/or the executive branches.

In the Constitutional Convention of 1789, Dickinson, the delegate from Delaware, had attempted, along with others, to insert a provision for tenure of judges within the Constitution. This provision was apparently of a more precise nature than that which eventuated in the third article. President Jefferson was of the opinion that a "better remedy, I think, would be to give future commissions to judges for 6 years with reappointment by the President with the approbation of both Houses."

Mr. President, the provision proposed in my present joint resolution calls for each such justice or judge appointed before or after the ratification of this section shall vacate his office after serving therein for 6 years, or after 6 months have passed following the ratification of this section, whichever period ends later, unless within 6 months before the date on which he would otherwise vacate his office he has been reappointed to such office by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Various legislators from time to time during the next 9 years under the sponsorship of Jefferson's administration introduced amendments of this nature. The most prominent of these amendments was introduced in 1805 by John Randolph, from Virginia. This amendment provided for the removal of judges by the President on the joint address of both Houses of Congress.

All of these bills failed, largely because of the declining powers of the Chief Justice, John Marshall. This decline of power somewhat mitigated the tensions between the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of the Government. From 1803, the year of the Marbury against Madison decision, until 1855, the year of the Dred Scott decision, the Supreme Court did not exercise any powers of nullification vested in its authority by the Judiciary Act of 1789.

Thus, Mr. President, the question of judicial tenure seems to have become dormant and to have been abandoned in its original form until 1937 when, in effect, it seems to have assumed another form in the famous court-packing policies of President Roosevelt. It was here again that a President, representing the will of the popular majority, found himself embroiled, as Jefferson had been, in conflict with a Court consisting of judges whose socio-economic backgrounds predisposed them to an almost unmitigated series of nullifications of socioeconomic reforms which the President and Congress were attempting to bring about under the New Deal.

Resorting to an expedient presented to him somewhat fortuitously, namely, that the majority of the justices of the Supreme Court were approaching the age of 70, Roosevelt fostered a bill providing for a doubling of the number of Supreme Court Justices and a retirement age of 70 for those and subsequent justices on the highest Federal tribunal.

Mr. President, I have briefly reviewed the history of the Supreme Court. I believe the facts indicate clearly that the members of the Federal judiciary periodically should come up for review and reappointment.

These judges and justices are not responsible to the people or anyone else, except for "good behavior," which is a broad and almost undefinable term when dealing with judges. The appointment of Federal judges and justices to life terms is not a democratic process, to say the least, although it does exist under our Constitution.

The vast growing importance of the Federal courts makes it even more imperative today that we correct this situation than it was when Jefferson and others pointed it out.

It stands to reason that the only practicable and possible way to bring democracy to our Federal court structure without endangering its dignity is to bring them up for review and reconfirmation or reappointment every 6 years, as was suggested by Thomas Jefferson and as my proposed constitutional amendment would do.

While we have a division of the peoples' powers in our triumvirate system of Government, only two branches are directly responsible back to the people for application of this power and return to the people for periodic "reappointment" or "reconfirmation." The legislative membership must be reelected periodically as are the President and Vice President in the executive branch; but the court memberships are made for life and ascend a position from which it is virtually impossible to be dislodged by us, the President, or the people, regardless of what they inject into the courts disguised behind the name of justice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 7) proposing an amendment to the Constitution to provide for the reappointment or reconfirmation each 6 years of justices and judges of the courts of the United States who are not appointed for prescribed terms, introduced by Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRESIDENTIAL ITEM VETO POWERS

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS], I submit, for appropriate reference, a concurrent resolution proposing an amendment to the Joint Rules of the House and Senate to give the President item veto powers over appropriation bills and over nonappropriation bills which contain authorizations to borrow money directly from the Treasury.

I am privileged to have the distinguished senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS] as cosponsors of the concurrent resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The concurrent resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 1), submitted by Mr. BUSH, for himself and other Senators, was received and referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That, effective on the 1st day of the 2d regular session of the 86th Congress, the joint rule of the Senate and of the House of Representatives contained in section 138 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) No bill or joint resolution making appropriations or authorizing the borrowing of money directly from the Treasury shall be reported to or considered in either House unless it contains a section which shall read as follows ((1) in the case of any bill (or joint resolution) making an appropriation or (2) in the case of any bill (or joint resolution) authorizing the borrowing of money directly from the Treasury):

"(1) SEC. . When this bill (or joint resolution) shall have been presented to the President as required by section 7 of article I of the Constitution, the President shall have power to disapprove any amount or any provision, whether or not related to an amount, which is contained herein, in the same manner as he may, under said section 7, disapprove as a whole any bill so presented to him. The provisions of said section 7 which relate to reconsideration shall also apply to any amount or provision or part thereof so disapproved to the same extent as they apply to a bill that has been disapproved in its entirety.

"(2) SEC. . When this bill (or joint resolution) shall have been presented to the President as required by section 7 of article I of the Constitution, the President shall have power to disapprove any authorization for borrowing money directly from the Treasury, which is contained herein, in the same manner as he may, under said section 7, disapprove as a whole any bill so presented to him. The provisions of said section 7 which relate to reconsideration shall also apply to any authorization or part thereof so disapproved to the same extent as they apply to a bill that has been disapproved in its entirety."

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the concurrent resolution may lie at the desk until the close of business on Monday next, in order that other Senators may join in sponsorship, if they so desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BUSH. I regard the provision of the item veto as one of the steps which must be taken to enable the administration and the Congress to recapture control of the financial affairs of the United States.

The concurrent resolution proposing the item veto represents a reform long overdue. It is one of the steps which must be taken to enable the administration and the Congress to recapture control of the financial affairs of the United States.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a statement by a former General Counsel of the Treasury, Mr. Elbert B. Tuttle, discussing the constitutionality of proposals to amend the rules so as to give the President the item veto power.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF ELBERT P. TUTTLE, GENERAL COUNSEL OF THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT, ON THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE ITEM VETO, BEFORE A SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE COMMITTEE ON RULES AND ADMINISTRATION, U.S. SENATE, MAY 19, 1953

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I appreciate the privilege you have accorded me of appearing here today to discuss the constitutionality of the proposal for giving the President the power to disapprove individual items and provisions in appropriation bills. I consider it an honor that the subcommittee has asked me to express my views.

I understand that the matter specifically under discussion is the constitutionality of a provision proposed as a concurrent resolution which would be an exercise of the rule-making power of the Senate and the House of Representatives requiring that each appropriation measure include an authorization for the President to disapprove individual items or provisions. I will, therefore, limit my remarks to the issue of constitutionality, not touching upon the question of the desirability of the proposal except to indicate here at the outset that the Treasury Department is very much in favor of such a provision if the Congress should see fit to adopt it.

Before beginning my discussion of the constitutional question I would like to say that my years of practice as a lawyer have fostered in me a jealous regard for the Constitution. I could not support or defend any proposal for item veto if I had any doubts concerning its constitutionality. I should like to disclaim in advance any pretensions that I am an expert on a subject on which all of you gentlemen know far more than I will ever know. I refer to the power of the Houses of Congress to make their own rules.

As we all know, article I, section 7, of the Constitution describes in general language the procedure for enacting a bill. Among other things it provides that "every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall * * * be presented to the President * * *; if he approves he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it."

Neither this nor any other provision of the Constitution defines or indicates what shall constitute a bill, however. From the history of the Constitutional Convention it seems clear that the framers of the document meant that details such as this should be entrusted to congressional determination, not embodied in rigid constitutional provisions. In this respect the authority of the Congress is greater than that of the legislatures of many States whose constitutions contain provisions dealing with the form and essential requirements of bills.

But the Constitution does expressly give the two Houses of the Congress the power to determine the rules of their proceedings. The Supreme Court has said that this power to make rules is "absolute and beyond the challenge of any other body or tribunal." In United States v. Ballin (144 U.S. 1), the Court called attention to the fact that while the Constitution requires the presence of a quorum, it sets up no method of making this determination, and that it is therefore within the power of each House to prescribe any method which would be reasonably certain to ascertain the fact.

Under this explicit provision of the Constitution, then, it seems eminently reasonable that each of the two Houses may prescribe its own rules as to the form and consideration of bills. A bill, after all, is nothing but a vehicle for carrying a proposed law through the legislative process; it is simply a device by which the legislative will is expressed.

I think that clause 6 of rule XXIV of the House is particularly relevant here, because it shows that rules of this character have in fact been adopted. That rule provides that after an omnibus private relief bill has passed the House under certain circumstances "said bill shall be dissolved into the several bills and resolutions of which it is composed." The rule also provides that in the consideration of any omnibus bill the proceedings "shall have the same force and effect as if each Senate and House bill or resolution therein contained or referred to were considered by the House as a separate and distinct bill or resolution." This seems to indicate clearly that the House had no doubt that it could legislatively determine under its own rules what constitutes a "bill." It shows clearly that it is not a novel concept that there can be a "bill" within a "bill," as we ordinarily use that term. Thus, the reference to "bill" in article I, section 7, need not, if the Congress wishes to provide otherwise, mean exclusively the single package presented to the President.

Not only can the Senate and House prescribe their own separate rules of this character, but they can and have made joint rules. In my opinion, they have done this in the statutes which set out the form of enacting or resolving clauses, the form of appropriation act titles, and the procedure for engrossing, enrolling, signing by officers of Congress, and so on. While these joint rules happen to be in the form of statutes, there does not appear to be any reason why they would not be equally effective had they been adopted merely as joint rules.

There cannot be any doubt that the Congress could take each item or provision in an appropriation measure and set it up as a separate bill. If this were done the President would of course have the authority to disapprove each item. Since the result can be achieved by Congress if it desires, and since the Congress has the authority to prescribe by joint rules what it considers a bill, there appears to be no reason why the Congress should have to resort to the cumbersome device of physically separating the items to achieve the desired result. It does not seem reasonable to believe that the framers of the Constitution intended giving the word "bill" such a rigid and limited meaning that the Congress would be required to enact thousands of separate bills rather than one inclusive bill simply to enable the Congress to carry out its own intent with respect to the Executive veto. Surely such a construction of the Constitution would subordinate substance to form.

Article I, section 7, simply means that all legislation which has passed the Congress must, before it becomes law, be presented to the President for his approval. The intent of the Constitution is that legislation shall be a meeting of the minds of the Congress and the Executive—the Congress affirmatively creating the legislation and the President exercising a right of approval or disapproval.

The Constitution has left the method by which this result is to be accomplished largely in the discretion of the Congress. I believe that the method adopted in the proposal before you is clearly within the competence of Congress.

There are not, as you will readily understand from the nature of this subject as I have discussed it, Federal court decisions which supply precedents in our inquiry. I would like to close my remarks, however, by referring to the words of a State court when it dealt with a similar subject. The case is State v. Platt (2 S. C. 150; 16 Am. Repts. 647), and while it does not of course deal with the Federal Constitution nor with precisely the same issue, I think the views expressed are especially pertinent. I attach a quotation from this decision as an annex to my remarks:

"EXCERPTS FROM STATE v. PLATT (2 S.C. 150; 16 AM. REPTS. 647)

"Section 22, article II, of the (South Carolina) constitution, declares that 'every bill or joint resolution which shall have passed the general assembly, except on a question of adjournment, shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the Governor, and if he approves of it, he shall sign it.'

"There are but two modes of viewing this clause as it regards the present question: Either the term 'bill' is to be regarded as exclusively applicable to the entire enactment as a whole, or else each substantial part thereof is to be regarded as a separate bill, dependent for its force upon its relation to the several stages of legislative and executive action.

"In a technical sense, the term 'bill' is applicable properly to the enactment as a whole. Although the technical sense of words should prevail, where not inconsistent with the clear intent of the instrument, yet when such intent requires that words should be used in the larger sense, it is competent so to regard them. If we should hold that the constitution regards the enactment as a whole, in an exclusive sense, we would be led to the inevitable conclusion that to become a law all the substantial parts of the measure must have together passed through all the requisite stages.

* * * * *

"Forced upon the opposite construction, that every substantial part of a bill is to be regarded as a bill in the sense of the constitution, we find nothing in our way but the technical import of the term 'bill.' It is not easy to perceive why, if any detached part of a statute is a law within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States forbidding States passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts, any part of a bill is not a bill under a clause intended to secure deliberation on the passage of legislative enactments. Such a conclusion is inevitable, if regard is had to the fixed principles governing constitutional construction. The objects had in view, by a constitution of government, are habitually substantial; matters of form are usually left to the legislative body, as subject to change with the progress of ideas and events. The great objects in view, in framing a constitution, are the division and distribution of the powers of Government, the establishment of limits and boundaries beyond which they shall not be exercised, and the creation of an efficient responsibility tending to restrain and furnish the means to correct abuse of public authority. Clauses having for their object the creation of responsibility in the exercise of political functions, are, to a large extent, intended to act upon the motive, either by way of creating inducements for right action, or removing the temptation or opportunity to such abusive exercises. This is, in part, accomplished by fixing the responsibility for all political action in some defined person, or body of persons, by securing deliberation in the performance of public acts, and by ascertaining modes of authentication and action in important cases vitally affecting the welfare of the State. It is obvious that, in construing clauses of this class, substance, rather than form, is to be considered. The object to be secured is to be sought for, not alone in the formal expressions of the constitution, nor yet in the technical character of the means employed to secure its ends, but, in the nature of the subject, intended to be acted upon through such means. In a word, the language of the constitution, in such cases, is to be construed in the largest sense fairly attributable to it, and that will best subserve the objects it has in view."

ADDITIONAL CLERICAL ASSISTANT FOR COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICE AND CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 7), which was referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service is authorized, from February 1, 1959, through January 31, 1960, to employ one additional clerical assistant to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate at rates of compensation to be fixed by the chairman in accordance with the provisions of Public Law 4, 80th Congress, approved February 19, 1947, as amended.

INVESTIGATION OF CERTAIN MATTERS WITHIN JURISDICTION OF COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICE AND CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 8), which was referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized under sections 134(a) and 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, and in accordance with its jurisdictions specified by rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, to examine, investigate, and make a complete study of any and all matters pertaining to—

(1) the administration by the Post Office Department of the postal service, particularly with respect to (a) research and development, (b) quality and frequency of mail service rendered the public, and (c) postal policy;

(2) the desirability of the acquisition by the Post Office Department of the equipment and facilities of the Railway Express Agency;

(3) the effect of postage rate increases on business enterprises and on the national economy generally;

(4) a group medical and hospitalization program for Federal employees; and

(5) the administration of the Federal employee group life insurance program by the Civil Service Commission.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution the committee, from February 1, 1959, to January 31, 1960, inclusive, is authorized to (1) make such expenditures as it deems advisable; (2) to employ upon a temporary basis, technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants: Provided, That the minority is authorized to select one person for appointment, and the person so selected shall be appointed and his compensation shall be so fixed that his gross rate shall not be less by more than $1,200 than the highest gross rate paid to any other employee; and (3) with the prior consent of the heads of the departments or agencies concerned, and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to utilize the reimbursable services, information, facilities and personnel of any of the departments or agencies of the Government.

SEC. 3. The committee shall report its findings, together with its recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later than January 31, 1960.

SEC. 4. Expenses of the committee, under this resolution, which shall not exceed $90,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

MARY A. FORD—REFERENCE OF BILL TO COURT OF CLAIMS

Mr. CARLSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 9); which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 819) entitled "A bill for the relief of Mary A. Ford," now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, is hereby referred to the Court of Claims; and the court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of sections 1492 and 2509 of title 28 of the United States Code and report to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date, giving such findings of fact and conclusions thereon as shall be sufficient to inform the Congress of the nature and character of the demand as a claim, legal or equitable, against the United States and the amount, if any, legally or equitably due from the United States to the claimant.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS

Mr. LANGER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 10); which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate (relating to standing committees) is amended by—

(1) striking out subparagraphs 10 through 13 in paragraph (h) of section (1);

(2) striking out subparagraphs 16 through 19 in paragraph (l) of section (1); and

(3) inserting in section (1) after paragraph (o) the following new paragraph:

"(p) Committee on Veterans' Affairs, to consist of nine Senators, to which committee shall be referred all proposed legislation, messages, petitions, memorials, and other matters relating to the following subjects:

"1. Veterans' measures, generally.

"2. Pensions of all wars of the United States, general and special.

"3. Life insurance issued by the Government on account of service in the Armed Forces.

"4. Compensation of veterans.

"5. Vocational rehabilitation and education of veterans.

"6. Veterans' hospitals, medical care, and treatment of veterans.

"7. Soldiers' and sailors' civil relief.

"8. Readjustment of servicemen to civil life."

SEC. 2. Effective for the remainder of the Eighty-fifth Congress, section (4) of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended to read as follows:

"(4) (a) Each Senator shall serve on two standing committees and no more; except that not to exceed twenty-one Senators of the majority party, and not to exceed nine Senators of the minority party, who are members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, the Committee on Government Operations, the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, or the Committee on Veterans' Affairs may serve on three standing committees and no more.

"(b) In the event that during the Eighty-fifth Congress members of one party in the Senate are replaced by members of the other party, the thirty third-committee assignments shall in such event be distributed in accordance with the following table:

"Senate seats		Third-committee assignments
Majority	Minority	Majority	Minority
48	48	23	7
51	45	17	13"

SEC. 3. Effective at the beginning of the Eighty-sixth Congress, section (4) of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended to read as follows:

"(4) Each Senator shall serve on two standing committees and no more; except that not to exceed nineteen Senators of the majority party, and not to exceed seven Senators of the minority party, who are members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, Committee on Government Operations, the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, or the Committee on Veterans' Affairs may serve on three standing committees and no more."

SEC. 4. The Committee on Veterans' Affairs is authorized and directed as promptly as feasible after its appointment and organization to confer with the Committee on Finance and the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare for the purpose of determining what disposition should be made of proposed legislation, messages, petitions, memorials, and other matters theretofore referred to the Committee on Finance and the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare during the Eighty-fifth Congress which are within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

INVESTIGATION OF CERTAIN MATTERS PERTAINING TO PUBLIC AND PRIVATE HOUSING

Mr. SPARKMAN (for himself and Mr. CAPEHART) submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 11), which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized under sections 134 (a) and 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, and in accordance with its jurisdictions specified by rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, to examine, investigate, and make a complete study of any and all matters pertaining to public and private housing.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution the committee, from February 1, 1959, to January 31, 1960, inclusive, is authorized to (1) make such expenditures as it deems advisable; (2) to employ, upon a temporary basis, technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants: Provided, That the minority is authorized to select one person for appointment, and the person so selected shall be appointed and his compensation shall be so fixed that his gross rate shall not be less by more than $1,200 than the highest gross rate paid to any other employee; and (3) with the prior consent of the heads of the departments or agencies concerned, and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to utilize the reimbursable services, information, facilities, and personnel of any of the departments or agencies of the Government.

SEC. 3. The committee shall report its findings, together with its recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later than January 31, 1960.

SEC. 4. Expenses of the committee, under this resolution, which shall not exceed $114,500, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO RULE XXV

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment in the nature of a resolution to the pending resolution, which amendment would amend rule XXV of the "Standing Rules of the Senate" so as to create a Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

I ask, as a parliamentary inquiry, whether the proposed amendment, if not acted upon during the course of debate on the Johnson resolution, would be referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration for its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Parliamentarian advises the Chair that in order to make the proposed amendment in order on the Johnson resolution, notice in writing under rule XL would have to be given. If the proposed amendment were submitted as a separate resolution, it would be referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I submit the resolution and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 12) was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That rule XXV of the "Standing Rules of the Senate" (relating to standing committees) is amended by—

(1) striking out subparagraphs 10 through 13 in paragraph (h) of section (1);

(2) striking out subparagraphs 16 through 19 in paragraph (l) of section (1); and

(3) inserting in section (1) after paragraph (o) the following new paragraph;

"(p) Committee on Veterans' Affairs, to consist of nine Senators, to which committee shall be referred all proposed legislation, messages, petitions, memorials, and other matters relating to the following subjects:

"1. Veterans' measures, generally.

"2. Pensions of all wars of the United States, general and special.

"3. Life insurance issued by the Government on account of service in the Armed Forces.

"4. Compensation of veterans.

"5. Vocational rehabilitation and education of veterans.

"6. Veterans' hospitals, medical care, and treatment of veterans.

"7. Soldiers' and sailors' civil relief.

"8. Readjustment of servicemen to civil life."

SEC. 2. Effective for the remainder of the 85th Congress, section (4) of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended to read as follows:

"(4) (a) Each Senator shall serve on two standing committees and no more; except that not to exceed 21 Senators of the majority party, and not to exceed 9 Senators of the minority party, who are members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, the Committee on Government Operations, the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, or the Committee on Veterans' Affairs may serve on three standing committees and no more.

"(b) In the event that during the 85th Congress members of one party in the Senate are replaced by members of the other party, the thirty third-committee assignments shall in such event be distributed in accordance with the following table:

"Senate seats		Third-committee assignments
48	48	23	7
51	45	17	13"

SEC. 3. Effective at the beginning of the 86th Congress, section (4) of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended to read as follows:

"(4) Each Senator shall serve on two standing committees and no more; except that not to exceed 19 Senators of the majority party, and not to exceed 7 Senators of the minority party, who are members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, the Committee on Government Operations, the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, or the Committee on Veterans' Affairs may serve on three standing committees and no more."

SEC. 4. The Committee on Veterans' Affairs is authorized and directed as promptly as feasible after its appointment and organization to confer with the Committee on Finance and the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare for the purpose of determining what disposition should be made of proposed legislation, messages, petitions, memorials, and other matters theretofore referred to the Committee on Finance and the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare during the 85th Congress which are within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

AMENDMENT OF RULES—AMENDMENTS

Mr. RUSSELL submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him to the resolution (S. Res. 5) amending rules XXII and XXXIII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him to Senate Resolution 5, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. JAVITS submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him to Senate Resolution 5, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. DOUGLAS (for himself, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. JAVITS, Mr. CASE of New Jersey, Mr. MORSE, Mr. KUCHEL, Mr. HENNINGS, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. CLARK, Mr. KEATING, Mr. MCNAMARA, Mr. NEUBERGER, Mr. HART, and Mr. MCCARTHY), submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to Senate Resolution 5, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him to Senate Resolution 5, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. BYRD of Virginia:

Address delivered by him in Chicago, Ill., on December 11, 1958, before the Illinois Manufacturers' Association.

DAVIS ELKINS, OF WEST VIRGINIA

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, a very distinguished West Virginia pioneer and statesman passed away this week. His name is Davis Elkins. His is a remarkable family. His father was a U.S. Senator. Davis Elkins himself was a U.S. Senator. In addition his father-in-law was a U.S. Senator; and his wife has been an active participant in Republican politics, and on several occasions was a candidate for the House of Representatives from a West Virginia district.

Davis Elkins was a pioneer in developing the resources of his State, and he was a great civic-minded leader. Among other things, he was the donor of Davis-Elkins College, which is under Presbyterian sponsorship; and he had a great war record, not only in the Spanish-American War, but also in World War I.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a brief statement on Davis Elkins.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FORMER SENATOR DAVIS ELKINS

Former U.S. Senator Davis Elkins of West Virginia died today from an extended illness. Death came in his sleep at a hospital in Richmond, Va., where he had been a patient.

With the death of Senator Elkins there passed from the industrial scene of West Virginia one of the last of a long list of pioneers in the development of much of the natural wealth of the State. The former U.S. Senator Stephen B. Elkins, father of Davis Elkins, had collaborated with former U.S. Senator Henry Gassaway Davis, his father-in-law, in processing and marketing timber and coal and in building many of the original railroads of the State.

It was from the late Stephen B. Elkins that the city of Elkins received its name.

Senator Elkins is survived by his widow, three children and six grandchildren. His children are Mrs. Charles J. Kelly (Katherine) of New York City; Davis Elkins, Jr., of Elkins, W. Va., and Mrs. A. Thomas Zirpolo (Maureen) of Cleveland, Ohio.

The family has been active in Republican politics in West Virginia and the Nation for three-quarters of a century.

Davis Elkins was born in Washington, D.C., in 1876 while his father was serving as a Delegate in the U.S. Congress representing the Territory of New Mexico. His mother, the former Hallie Davis, daughter of the then U.S. Senator Henry Gassaway Davis, met and married his father when he came to Washington as a congressional Delegate.

He attended Lawrenceville, N.J., preparatory school; Phillips Academy, Andover, Mass., and Harvard University.

He was a veteran of the Spanish-American War, having served as a first lieutenant with Company E of the First West Virginia Volunteer Infantry. He reentered the active service of his country during World War I and served as a major in Europe. It was during his service in the Army that he was elected to the U.S. Senate from West Virginia in November of 1918. He did not seek reelection at the conclusion of his term in 1925.

Upon leaving the U.S. Senate, Senator Elkins undertook the active management of his coal and timber holdings, principally in northern West Virgina. He actively pursued this interest until his retirement due to ill health several years ago.

He had helped shape the Republican Party activities at the end of World War I and had played an important role in the party's financing during the period from 1920 until his health no longer permitted his active participation.

It was upon this withdrawal from a leading role that his wife, Mary R. Elkins, began to represent him in active participation on the political stage and was sent from their home congressional district in West Virginia as a delegate to the 1952 Republican National Convention. Following that Mrs. Elkins was twice a candidate for Congress in the Second District.

The Elkins family has been one of the political and social leaders in the Nation since Stephen B. Elkins came to Washington in the 1870's. During the period of Davis Elkins' business career in West Virginia, he also maintained a home in Washington and most of the Nation's political leaders were frequent guests with him and his family.

The Davis and Elkins College in Elkins, W. Va., was an original joint gift to the Presbyterian Church by the two families who had lived in and developed that part of the State. Their original homes still serve as dormitories on the campus of the school.

Funeral arrangements are incomplete, but the body will be interred in the family plot at Elkins.

ADDRESS BY THE POSTMASTER GENERAL BEFORE THE 63D CONGRESS OF AMERICAN INDUSTRY OF THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MANUFACTURERS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, on December 5, 1958, the Honorable Arthur E. Summerfield, the Postmaster General, delivered an address at the 63d Congress of American Industry by the National Association of Manufacturers, in New York City. His address has been widely acclaimed for its courageous approach to some of our more difficult and controversial problems, and I believe it merits much wider currency through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXT OF ADDRESS BY THE POSTMASTER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES BEFORE THE 63D CONGRESS OF AMERICAN INDUSTRY OF THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MANUFACTURERS, WALDORF-ASTORIA HOTEL IN NEW YORK CITY, ON DECEMBER 5, 1958

It is not easy for me to put into words the pleasure and sense of challenge that I feel in appearing before this distinguished audience. But I do find it easy to say this—I feel very much at home. For here I meet men whose philosophy of government is the same as that which I hold—men who practice the sound economic concepts that I have struggled all my life to advance—leaders of our incomparably productive capitalistic system, the system on which the future of our country, the well-being of our people, depend.

I realize that few groups in America are better informed on our country's problems than this group. That being so, tonight, at the close of your 63d Annual Congress, I shall not lay new facts before you. On the contrary, I want you to consider for a moment with me some familiar facts, but facts that are all too often forgotten, or ignored.

MAJOR NATIONAL PROBLEMS

As President Lightner emphasized in his keynote speech, the major problems facing our Nation today are not technological or material. Rather, they are problems in human relationships.

As I see them, they are these:

First. How to maintain peace and national safety in a troubled world.

Second. How to promote the well-being and growth of our economy.

Third. How to make sure that our Government will continue to serve all of our people and not merely the special interest groups who seek to dominate its policies.

All of these problems are political. Indeed, they constitute the principal basis of the political controversies of our times. And more than that, they are interrelated.

It is my hope that the solutions I propose will make sense to America's businessmen as being economically sound, politically feasible, and in the best interest of all the American people. And I am quite sure that these solutions which I propose have the strong support of a great many able, dedicated members of both political parties.

SECURITY AND WORLD PEACE

Let me turn, first, to the most important one of them all—the problem of national security and world peace.

Here I want to quote two statements. First this one:

"We declare war upon you. We will win over the United States. * * * We are relentless in this and will prove the superiority of our system."

Then, this one:

"We will bury you."

These quotations, as you know, are Soviet in origin. They put us on notice that we are today at war. We are warned that the American way of life, the free way of life, is slated for extinction.

We must not discount the Soviet's firmness of purpose—their diabolical desire for world mastery—the grimness of their determination to destroy all that we value in life.

The Soviets mean what they say. We can expect them to act accordingly.

With you, I pray to God that the unfolding events of coming years will not visit again upon our Nation and people, and upon the millions who with us treasure liberty, the holocaust of another global conflict.

This we know for certain: The next war, should it ever come will be tremendously destructive.

Yet, despite this appalling possibility, my confidence in the security of our country and in our capacity to maintain peace has never wavered.

Here is why.

LAUDS ADMINISTRATION OFFICIALS

Looking to the next 2 years, I see still managing the Nation's foreign affairs, two of the finest and ablest men I have ever known or can ever expect to know—Dwight D. Eisenhower and John Foster Dulles.

And while we pay proper tribute here to a great President and a great Secretary of State, let us not forget that looming ever larger on the scene of world affairs is the figure of the President's next in command—the ablest, best equipped, and hardest working Vice President ever to serve the people of this Republic—RICHARD NIXON.

These are truly great men and the Communists know it.

The Reds admired Ike in war. They respect him in peace.

They have had many opportunities to know Foster Dulles' great talents in negotiation, and they have seen his mettle tested and proven under fire.

The Soviets and their enslaved millions have seen these extraordinary Americans in action—men with steel in their spines—men who face them down in tests of power—in Indochina—in Iran—in Guatemala—in Lebanon—in Quemoy, and Matsu.

Nor will the Reds ever forget the magnificent conduct of our Vice President in South America.

The Reds already have a good idea, I believe, of what forlorn results they will likely achieve if things are allowed to get too testy in Berlin.

AMERICANISM NOT BRINKMANSHIP

Some call this brinkmanship. I call it courageous Americanism.

The Reds now know that America will stand firm in the face of force or bluster.

They know that we will hold to principle.

They know that we will not truckle to an international bully.

They know that, under our present leadership, we will unflinchingly stand for the right in world affairs.

Those, my friends, are solid grounds for confidence in the continuance of world peace.

And this, I believe everyone should understand.

If ever the Soviet madmen should unleash an attack upon this Nation, the combined striking powers of our military forces will retaliate within the instant with crushing, irresistible force—leaving their heartland devastated—an eternal monument to the stupidity of their leaders and to the utter futility of war.

No one knows better than the Soviet leaders themselves that by waging war they can only destroy themselves. That plain, inescapable fact leads me to be confident of the continuance of peace. Even a Communist will not deliberately seek his own and his nation's destruction.

Looking to the immediate future, I see no reason for greater difficulty in world affairs because our Government happens to be politically divided. Americans do not divide on Americanism.

CONTINUE FIGHT FOR PEACE

Our course of action must consist of a tireless pursuit of a lasting peace; continuation of efforts to win a trustworthy disarmament; persistent development of the peaceful uses of the atom; steadiness in the face of force combined with a steadfast refusal to renege on principle; a constant strengthening of our vital alliances such at NATO, SEATO, and the Organization of American States; unswerving support of the United Nations; and here at home, so long as hostile forces are arrayed against this citadel of freedom, the continued maintenance of a solid and secure economy and the world's most powerful military force.

Yes, we can and we have every right to be confident of America's future in the world.

Now, let me turn to our second problem, which concerns affairs at home.

KEEP FREE ENTERPRISE HEALTHY

I am certain we have every right to expect that the business leadership of America which is so well represented here tonight, will keep our free enterprise system vital and expanding. Only thus can we extend and perfect our national defenses, checkmate the Soviet menace, and satisfy the rightful aspirations of Americans for further improvements in their material welfare.

But to do this, America requires a sound economic pholosophy, and sound policies firmly based on that philosophy.

What is that philosophy?

It was best expressed, I believe, when President Eisenhower said that America should be conservative when it comes to economic matters and liberal in dealing with human wants and aspirations.

This means that the Federal Government will discharge every legitimate obligation to its citizens—and I emphasize that word "legitimate"—but that it will do this within the framework of a responsible fiscal policy—with a concern not just to today's problem, but with an eye to tomorrow's problems as well—and with a solemn determination to reject any proposal that would socialize our trade and industry, or expand the Federal Government at the expense of State and local governments.

This philosophy does not seek political advantage by attempting to dig a gulf between the people and the business activities on which they depend for their livelihood and well-being.

It precludes promising the people more and more benefits and services to be paid for in the false coin of inflation.

It opposes policies which, under the guise of social progress, would hamper and harass the industrial and business activities which provide the wherewithal for social progress.

This is the political philosophy of greater opportunity for every American and the realization of his legitimate aspirations for himself and his children.

That is the political philosophy that I firmly believe the people of America will choose, once they come to understand that the true road to the realization of their hopes lies in the vigor and unlimited potential of their free enterprise economy.

Therefore, the initial step in the solution of the second problem I mentioned—the problem of promoting maximum well-being and economic growth—is to sell this philosophy and to eliminate the fantastic idea that there is a conflict betweeen the interests of the people and the industrial and business system from which they make their living.

The time has come—and let me warn you that the hour is late—for the American business community to marshal its forces in a carefully organized and boldly executed plan to accomplish this result.

To promote the well-being and growth of our economy it will be necessary to deal frankly and courageously with the factors which inhibit it.

THREAT OF INFLATION

There are two principal factors I want to talk about:

One is inflation; the other is onerous taxation.

They go hand in hand. When they exist in large degree there can never be enduring strength.

There is nothing mysterious about the causes of inflation.

It comes about sometimes because of an excess of spending.

This is the familiar case of too much money chasing after too few goods.

This can be private spending that goes far beyond private income; or it can be public spending that goes far beyond the revenues of Government.

To avoid inflation, we must keep our own private financial affairs in order and we must avoid abuse and misuse of private credit.

SOUND FEDERAL FISCAL POLICIES

But, we must also keep the financial affairs of Government in order.

Through sensible and courageous fiscal policy we must block the reckless plans for Federal spending that would create deficits, even when our economy is going at full blast, and which would feed endlessly the fires of inflation.

We are well out of the recession of this past year. Our recovery has been rapid and healthy. This is due to the steadfast refusal of the administration to accept the spending schemes that were being proposed less than a year ago.

The wild spending proposals that are being rumored for introduction before this coming Congress constitute a reckless tampering with our recovery. If this Congress doesn't meddle with the economy, 1959 should see it reach a higher plateau than it has ever yet attained.

The economic philosophy of the administration of which I am proud to be a member, has no room for the red-ink spending plans of which you will hear a great deal in the not-too-distant future.

If Congress had listened to our proposals, my own department would be out of the red and no longer chargeable with a share in the national deficit.

We expect the support of the American business community in the fight we propose to make against all forms of financial recklessness.

But there is another cause of inflation and it is all the more dangerous because it is less well understood.

UNION SPONSORED WAGE-PRICE SPIRAL

It is found in the demands of union bosses—the new monopolists—for wage increases not warranted by productivity gains.

Such demands raise production costs and push prices upward.

A combination of these two forces—a pull from the side of demand, reinforced by reckless Federal spending programs and a push from wage increases that outrun productivity gains, forced on American business by union bosses with monopolistic power—is the perfect formula for inflation.

What is to be done about wage increases that outrun productivity gains?

Whatever else is done, I am sure of this: We will make very little progress in eliminating this cause of inflation until it is better understood by the public generally and by the wage earners of America in particular.

Americans must understand that even those who get this kind of wage increase do not really benefit.

The price side of the wage-price spiral promptly catches up with them. And meanwhile, tens of millions of consumers who can least afford it have had their purchasing power cut.

These are the people on fixed incomes or whose incomes are slow to rise in response to inflationary pressures—pensioners, social security recipients, beneficiaries of life insurance policies, school teachers, clergymen, Government workers, and salaried employees generally.

All of these are robbed by inflation of part of the purchasing power they have every right to count on.

Lost purchasing power means fewer productive jobs.

To prevent the extension of these inflationary wage increases we need legislation to restore democracy and responsibility in our labor unions, to curb the present powers of the union dictators, and no less necessary in the public interest to redress the balance of power as between unions and management.

URGE ANTITRUST APPLIED TO UNION

The principle of antitrust should be applied to this labor boss monopoly.

Such legislation is not antiunion. Nor is it antilabor.

The cause of labor and of unionism will benefit by the application of proper checks and balances, just as the business community and the entire Nation benefited by laws which put a limit on the exercise of corporate power and prevented business organizations from taking advantage of one another and of the public.

Our third problem is to make sure our Government will continue to serve all of our people and not merely special interest groups.

I am certain that the President will once again propose corrective legislation to the Congress to protect our working people and businessmen, large and small, from exploitation by unscrupulous and corrupt union bosses.

I fervently hope that the Congress will rise to its responsibility of meeting the real requirements of the situation.

I say the American people will not again be fooled by the Congress trying to pass a milktoast bill, like the Kennedy-Ives bill.

Surely no thoughtful American can have listened to the revelations of the McClellan committee without realizing that the Government has very urgent legislative work to do in this field.

I feel the imperative necessity for a clean-up of labor racketeering.

WOULD CURB UNION-POLITICAL MACHINES

I feel no less deeply about the political onrush of the organized part of American labor, gathered up in phalanx, its millions of dollars and thousands of trained political manipulators drawn up in battle formation to seize control over our governmental processes.

It is reported that more than half of the Congressmen just elected are the beneficiaries of organized labor support, financial or otherwise.

This union success merely whets the bosses' appetite for a greater conquest in 1960, as it whets their appetites for legislative rewards to be ground out between now and then.

My friends, there was no victory, last November 4, for the Democrat Party as such.

Like the Republican Party, the Democrats have no full-time precinct workers, no full-time organizers, no nationwide slush fund amounting to millions of dollars with which to elect favorite sons, no means by which to discipline nonconformists, no way to extract dues dollars for the support of whomever the bosses pick.

But union bosses have these weapons, and it is these union bosses with the help of the Democrat Party, who won that fateful Tuesday a month ago—not the Democrat Party with the help of labor.

Americans will watch with fascinated interest these next 2 years as the minions of this rampaging political combine move to reward their masters.

FEARS LABOR-BOSSED CONGRESS

The bald truth is that America today teeters on the precipice of a labor-bossed Congress—not Congress under either of the present political parties as they have been known through the years. This means that the Congress will not be guided by the traditional principles of either party.

I know of no time in our country's history when the forces of intelligent conservatism have been in greater danger of obliteration.

Nor has there been a time when this Government by, for, and of all the people has been in greater danger of becoming by, for, and of a minority—not simply a minority of the American people, mind you, but a small minority even of our total working force.

Right here I want to express myself as clearly as I can on a phase of this matter that I consider of the utmost importance.

I think it is high time that the American people demand that the political activity of organized labor be brought within reasonable bounds, and clearly governed by law—just as the political activity of all other individuals and groups in this Nation are governed by law.

I think it is absolutely un-American for labor bosses to be permitted to spend union dues in political efforts that are often in direct opposition to what the dues-paying union member himself wants.

This must be corrected by law.

If it is not, the march of political affairs in our country is easily predictable. There will be no escaping Government dominated by a militant group of labor union bosses.

Now I want to repeat an extremely fundamental point.

There are those who assert that any remark critical of any activity of organized labor is antiunion in spirit and purpose.

This is demagoguery at its very worst.

Abuse in labor is just as bad for the workingman as any other abuse in our system.

I say that the best interests of America's working people and of the labor movement as a whole will be served by these badly needed reforms I have here proposed.

Yet, in the face of all this, many businessmen believe that politics and business do not mix. Today, politics and business, just as politics and labor, are inseparable—and the businessmen of our country, by holding back from active participation in politics, are only contributing to the destruction of the way of life in which they believe and on which they depend.

PUT SOUND GOVERNMENT BEFORE PEOPLE

I dare to hope that this gathering will mark the beginning of a planned and vigorously implemented effort to put the philosophy of constructive government clearly before the American people and back into the legislative halls of our State and National Governments.

Sound political leadership, beginning with the President, must have the understanding and active support of those who want sound government.

Little can be accomplished by legislators who place the public interest above group interests if, on election day, they go down to defeat because of lack of support from responsible citizens.

Those who want sound government cannot leave political activity entirely to others, either at campaign time or between campaigns.

Businessmen, especially, because of their knowledge of our economy, and their intimate awareness of the dangers of fallacious economic policies, must become active participants in political affairs.

BUSINESSMEN MUST TELL ECONOMIC STORY

They must seize every opportunity to acquaint their employees, their associates, their neighbors in the community, and their civic leaders with the truth about economic growth and about inflation and its causes.

They must understand that the political party of their choice is what they make it—either by their participation or lack of participation in its affairs and in its choice of candidates for office.

Unless businessmen devote more of their time and effort and organizing ability—as well as their money—to unselfish politics directed to the greatest common good, government by pressure groups will continue to grow.

Only by doing this can we be sure that the Government will serve all the people—not some special interest.

Candidates hand-picked by union bosses and elected by the campaign activities directed by union bosses will come to dominate the Halls of Congress and, heaven forbid, eventually perhaps the White House itself.

It has been made all too evident by union bosses what kind of policies we could expect from such a Government.

There would be heightened pressures for inflation all along the line and whatever economic expansion we would get would be through the investment of Government money or credit rather than through private enterprise.

This brings me back to the other factor which militates against our economic well-being and growth: taxation.

Excessive taxation interferes with our economic growth just as surely as does a dollar whose value tomorrow is doubted.

It interferes with the continuous private savings and investment of capital.

It is the savings and investment of all of us, and of our fathers and grandfathers, that have built our country into the productive marvel it is today. It is our continued savings and the savings of our children that will keep it that way and make it grow.

Thus are the means provided to create and develop new products, to install new and more efficient machines, to exploit the boundless scientific advances which are within our grasp.

For the most part, this capital must be private capital, accumulated and invested by individual citizens or retained from the earnings of business enterprises.

And we cannot have a vigorously growing economy within the framework of traditional American institutions unless we give greater incentives to private investment.

How are these obstacles to be removed?

RESPONSIBLE TAX REFORM

We must do this by thoughtful, responsible tax reduction and reform.

We must all recognize that our present tax structure is seriously outdated.

It is a set of laws reflecting largely the prejudices and emergencies of the past, especially of World War II, when the goal was the confiscation of war profits, not the building of a sound peacetime economy.

There is nothing to prevent our making plans now for a step-by-step program of progress toward a tax system more conducive to economic growth and improvement, and the effective initiation of this program should be timed with the improved Federal fiscal position that we can confidently expect in the very near future.

The present administration has a demonstrated record of success in tax reform and reduction.

The Revenue Act of 1954 was one of the most fundamental revisions of our tax structure ever undertaken. The time has come to plan for another bold and imaginative breakthrough on tax policy that will benefit and encourage all taxpayers, large and small.

This is not the place to go into details, but the major outlines of the needed reforms are clear.

We need a lower total Federal tax burden.

INCENTIVES OF TAX REFORM

We need schedules of personal and business tax rates that will give greater incentives to all Americans—individual and corporate—to work, to save, and to invest.

We need greater flexibility in the tax treatment of depreciation to encourage the rapid rate of investment in new machines and facilities on which an expanding economy and rising levels of living depend.

We need a simpler excise system. It is inconceivable that anyone could endorse the present haphazard conglomeration of varying excise rates on different products.

The time has come for this Nation to pledge itself to a program for achieving a tax structure more conducive to economic growth and rising levels of living for all Americans.

In the absence of such a program, the American people as a whole are hurt through having fewer job opportunities than would otherwise be available;

The progress of our society is hurt because we fail to produce the abundance that we would otherwise have for human betterment;

The Nation's safety is endangered by failing to achieve the rate of industrial growth of which we are capable; and

The fiscal position of our Government is hurt by losing the additional revenues which a lively, more rapidly expanding economy would produce.

And I dare remind you that Russia is already challenging American industry for our export trade. Her capacity to produce is presently growing substantially faster than America's—an estimated 8 percent for the past year, as compared to our recent 1.2 percent.

If these rates remain unchanged, Russia's total production can equal or surpass ours during the next 20 years.

It requires little imagination to contemplate what would have happened to the American economy were this to come to pass.

This does not need to happen. It is not inevitable.

It is, however, an important part of a challenge confronting us today.

THE CHALLENGE TO AMERICA

In conclusion, then, the thoughts I would leave with you are these:

First. We must keep our strength both military and economic in the face of our avowed enemy.

Second. We can do this only through maintaining economic well-being and continued growth.

Third. This requires a stable dollar, achieved in the main through provident Government financing along with control of pressures on prices caused by the insatiable and reckless wage and political demands of a few union labor bosses.

Fourth. Private savings, private investment, private initiative, and above all, private incentive, made us what we are today. We must strengthen these forces in American life by incentive—restoring tax reduction and tax reform. Let no one be deceived into thinking that State investment and State planning are worthwhile substitutes.

Finally, this is a time for all good Americans to join with our President and our responsible leaders in a program to successfully meet these challenges.

That, to my mind, is the essence of political leadership and necessary to the security and well-being of America.

It is also the essence of true liberalism—the kind of liberalism which knows that the strength and glory of our Nation is the strength and glory of free men organizing and conducting their lives in freedom, and which seeks to spread the life of freedom to all the peoples of the world.

There is our challenge, my friends—let us not merely face it together.

Rather, let us go out and work to meet it with all our hearts; so that our America will stay strong and free both for ourselves and our children who too deserve to know a land of liberty and opportunity.

SETTLEMENT OF AMERICAN AIRLINES STRIKE

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I am happy to announce, on the advice of Mr. Leverett Edwards, of the United States Mediation Service, that an agreement has been reached between American Airlines and the pilots' negotiating committee on all phases of their disagreement, that the language of the agreement has been nine-tenths drafted and approved by both the airline and the pilots, and that only one-tenth remains to be written.

This means that, subject to the approval of the executive council, which will meet tomorrow, the airline will again be in operation. It seems to me that Mr. Edwards deserves a great deal of credit for the diligent and sustained effort he has made to solve this labor dispute. Both the Pilots' Association and the officials of American Airlines also deserve much credit for bringing into compromise the elements of disagreement.

Furthermore, the many thousands of other employees of American Airlines who have been furloughed and who have been without work since January 4, will rejoice in this return-to-work movement, as will also the citizens of hundreds of cities throughout the country who have been greatly inconvenienced and subjected to a loss of major transportation facilities by the shutdown.

MY MARATHON TALK WITH RUSSIA'S BOSS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, one of the historic events of 1958 was the 8-hour conference between the distinguished senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] and the secretary of the Communist Party and Premier of the Soviet Union, Mr. Khrushchev.

A very good report of the conference is contained in the January 12, 1959, issue of Life magazine. I believe we will hear a great deal about the results of this conference in the months and years ahead. I ask unanimous consent that the article may be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MY MARATHON TALK WITH RUSSIA'S BOSS

(By Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, of Minnesota)

My guess would be that the two people in all the world who were most surprised by the extraordinary length and nature of my talk with Nikita S. Khrushchev in the Kremlin last December 1 were HUMPHREY and Khrushchev. As a U.S. Senator visiting Moscow on business that concerned both our governments, and also because I have as much curiosity as the next man, I had requested an appointment with the Premier of the U.S.S.R. But I did not count on it and I am sure that Khrushchev had no idea when he decided to receive me that we would be together in his office for 8 hours and 25 minutes—a longer period, I am told, than any other American has spent at one time with a Soviet chief of state.

It was long enough, certainly, for this interesting, powerful, and dangerous man to reveal himself in many moods. Khrushchev's eyes were damp when he spoke of a son who was killed in the last World War. They gleamed in sentimental remembrance when he recalled the poverty of his boyhood, his Christian upbringing and his turn to atheism. They narrowed, sharpened, and seemed to burn when he shook a forefinger in my face and said, "Don't you threaten me." Khrushchev eloquently denounced racial and religious prejudice, but he sneered at my country's concern for the freedom of the people of West Berlin. He pleaded for more understanding of the Communist system, but he derided the best known tenet of Marxist dogma: "From each according to his abilities, to each according to his needs."

A SENSE OF NATIONAL INSECURITY

Khrushchev tried at times to frighten me with his reports of Soviet advances in the development of missiles and hydrogen bombs, but at another moment he assured me that there will never be a war of his making. He spoke with intense confidence and pride of the growing economic and military might of his country. But he displayed, though, of course he never acknowledged, a deep sense of national insecurity and inferiority.

Without minimizing the importance of my talk with Khrushchev, I wish to make it clear that it was not at all the reason for my trip to Europe. My chief business in Moscow and in the seven other capitals I visited was to further international cooperation in medical research for the good of people everywhere. At Geneva I participated briefly as a Senate observer in the United States-Soviet negotiations on the suspension of nuclear tests and the prevention of surprise attack. Before going to Moscow I visited Berlin for the specific purpose of stating, on the spot, that all Americans stand together in their determination to keep West Berlin free. During my 7 days in Moscow, I spent much more time with the leaders of research in medicine, health, and agriculture than with politicians. Mrs. Humphrey, who traveled with me at our expense, broadened our nonpolitical experience by separate visits to schools, hospitals, and libraries, and on our Sunday in Moscow we did what we would have done at home: we went to church.

Partisan politics played no part in our trip. Otherwise I would have taken along a good Democrat as my staff assistant. The only assistant who accompanied me was a Republican, Julius N. Cahn, the able project director of the Senate Committee on Government Operations. (Dr. Michael Shimkin, of the National Cancer Institute, was also along for part of the time as a medical consultant). As for my meeting with Premier Khrushchev, I realize that some people might misunderstand my motives in talking with the world's No. 1 Communist and reporting what he had to say. I am confident, however, that most Americans understand that anything which adds to our knowledge of the man and the mind at the summit of Soviet power is valuable information for the free world. My record as a working anti-Communist in Minnesota goes back more than 20 years, and I noticed with interest that Khrushchev had been accurately briefed on my Senate record. Throughout our conversation he treated me as a confirmed anti-Communist who was obviously beyond persuasion. And, all of that aside, I have never believed that I was put on earth to lead a dull life.

At 2:30 p.m. on December 1, one of the officials handling my appointments suddenly told me that "the first minister" expected to receive me at 3 o'clock. In a matter of minutes, I was at the Kremlin with two official escorts and an intourist photographer. We walked at least 150 feet down a tremendous, carpeted corridor on the second floor, then another 100 feet or so along a similar corridor to our right, and entered the outer office of the Premier's suite.

INSIDE KHRUSHCHEV'S OFFICE

At 3 minutes to 3 o'clock I was ushered into Khrushchev's office. It appeared to be some 50 feet long by 35 feet wide, big but not particularly ornate or impressive. Khrushchev was seated at a very plain desk of dark wood, measuring perhaps 6 by 4 feet, just about the size of my desk in Washington. As he got up and walked around the desk to meet me with his hand outstretched, I could see that he was well groomed in a dark blue suit, a light tie, a white shirt with simple cuff links, and two small decorations in the form of red stars on his jacket lapel. After we had greeted each other he asked if I would mind having a few photographs taken. The Soviet photographers ordered Khrushchev and me around just as they would have done in Washington, and I said something to the effect that photographers were the same everywhere—always one more. Khrushchev laughed and asked me to pose for one more with him.

A long conference table with nine chairs on each side stood at right angles to the center of Khrushchev's desk, with about 4 feet between the desk and the near end of the table. Khrushchev motioned me to a chair at the side of this table, near the desk, and sat down opposite me. The very skillful interpreter Oleg Troyanovsky took a seat between us at the end of the table and we got down to business.

Troyanovsky, who is a son of the former Soviet Ambassador in Washington, was a very important figure to me for the next 8 hours. He had lived and gone to school in the United States and he seemed to know every shading of American idiom and its Russian equivalent. He even had the Russian word for "lousy." Khrushchev often talked for up to 5 minutes at a time, but Troyanovsky took notes and never lost the track. He was so skillful and unobtrusive that I felt as if Khrushchev and I were talking without a go-between. Even though Khrushchev did not speak a word of English, I suspected that he understood some things I said before they were translated, and from his tone and mannerism I often got his drift before I heard the English version. At least three time during the conversation I asked Troyanovsky if I was overstaying my welcome, and he said to leave that to Khrushchev: "If he wants you to go he will let you know." When Troyanovsky finally mentioned my qualms to Khrushchev, he waved his hands and said, "Nyet, nyet, stay—we have much to talk about." And it was Troyanovsky who supplied me with paper and a pencil to take notes. I took none during the first hour and a half, figuring that Khrushchev might be offended or talk less freely if I did. When I finally asked if it would be all right he said, "Of course, take all you wish," and Troyanovsky gave me a tablet of heavy paper. When I left, I had 24 pages of notes.

The substance of our discussion may have more meaning if I first describe the impression Khrushchev made on me.

Nikita Khrushchev is a serious figure, never to be taken lightly. He laughed, cracked jokes and had a way of veering suddenly from the gravest topics with a quick jest or some soothing banality. But there was always a serious undertone. I got the feeling that Khrushchev is a man with no time to waste.

He is very conscious of his age. He remarked several times that he is 65, adding that he "won't be around forever." (He observed that Chancellor Konrad Adenauer, who is 83, can hardly be conducting West Germany's affairs much longer.) Khrushchev did not "talk old." He was brimming with life. But it was interesting that he should bring up the matter of age as often as he did. As always, he probably was making a point. In this instance I think his point was that the next man in charge of Soviet policy may not be as reasonable as Khrushchev professes to be, and therefore Western leaders had better come to terms with him.

Khrushchev is an outgoing man who just loves to talk. He seems to be under a driving compulsion to explain himself, and when he explains himself he reveals himself. I am sure that I learned much more from him and about him by coming back at his points with points of my own—points that he had to meet and discuss—than I would have learned if I had made some abrupt rejoinder. Here, I believe, is a cue for our Government and allies. We will never settle the world's problems just by talking with Khrushchev, but we cannot lose by it and we may learn something useful.

I have mentioned Khrushchev's many assertions of pride and confidence in the power of the Soviet Union and the sense of insecurity and inferiority that can also be detected in him. These two characteristics are not as contradictory as they may seem. Khrushchev reminded me of somebody who has risen from poverty and weakness to wealth and power but is never wholly confident of himself and his new status. Khrushchev was a little too assertive, a little too confident. Here, I concluded, was a man who might be capable of attempting just about anything in order to prove—to himself as well as to others—that he and his country are as strong and invincible as he wants to believe they are.

As a politician, I found one of Khrushchev's characteristics particularly engaging. He, too, is a politician who seems to enjoy the great game of politics. His game is played in a very limited circle of a few hundred or perhaps a few score Communists in the top ranks. But he talked with apparently genuine delight of the way in which (to hear him tell it) he had outwitted Molotov, Zhukov, Bulganin, Kaganovich, Malenkov, and others whom he has publicly denounced as "antiparty" scoundrels. Stalin would probably have had them killed, and I do not doubt that Khrushchev would do the same if he figured he had to and could get by with it. But, listening to his off-record account of his recent maneuvers for power, I got a distinct impression that Khrushchev enjoys the party infighting. I gathered that he would rather outtalk and outsmart his opponents than exile or liquidate them. He gives you the idea that his way is more fun.

During the early part of our talk, before things warmed up, Khrushchev sat well back in his chair—relaxed, not disinterested, but detached. When we got to subjects of immediate interest to him, he sat up, leaned forward, and occasionally emphasized his remarks with a pointed finger or a tap on the felt cover of the table. I am sure that at times he was utterly furious. But he never once pounded the table or so much as slapped it. He never spoke in a tone of anger. In an emotional moment his voice, normally a conversational monotone, might take on what I can only describe as a kind of rounded force, full and resonant. Or it might sharpen and rise (still without obvious anger), and he would speak in a rather staccato manner. When I replied with what I hope was courteous firmness, he invariably moderated his tone and often changed the subject.

Besides his words, Premier Khrushchev talked a great deal with his eyes. They appeared to be a kind of bluish hazel, just a shade this side of brown. They were sharp eyes, but I would not call them "hard." Most of the time they were wide open, almost as if they were distended. When Khrushchev was enjoying himself—maybe kidding someone or recalling his political bouts—they had a happy sparkle. In moments of great intensity, however, his brows would furrow and his eyes would narrow. I saw then what is meant by "burning eyes."

We were together a good hour and a half before Khrushchev displayed much emotion of any sort. I did most of the talking in this period. It has long been my belief that despite the political differences between the United States and the Soviet Union there are many areas of nonpolitical cooperation that are open to our governments and people. I urged him to take a personal interest in these subjects. My chief emphasis was upon the great need and opportunity for international cooperation in medical research—for example, jointly combating cancer and heart disease—the approach that I call "health for peace." Khrushchev agreed (or professed to agree) with practically everything that I had to say on this vital subject. Among other things, he said the Soviet Union will give enthusiastic support to my proposal that the U.N. sponsor a worldwide International Public Health and Medical Research Year, probably in 1961, somewhat similar to the successful International Geophysical Year. He also promised to do his powerful best at the Moscow end to remove bureaucratic and political obstructions in the way of the cultural exchange program that the Soviet and American governments agreed upon a full year ago. With frequent ejaculations of "Da, da, da," Khrushchev indicated that he believes as strongly as I do that both our countries stand to benefit from the maximum exchange of visitors and knowledge.

This aspect of our discussion was much more important than the limited space given it here suggests. Just before we parted, our talk returned to the matter of collaboration in medical research, and Khrushchev again assured me of his interest and agreement. Whatever may come of it, I made a good try in a good cause.

Khrushchev's enthusiasm on this subject seemed to be genuine. Obviously, however, it was the restrained enthusiasm of a man who is discussing things that he normally leaves to other people. It was only when we took up the subjects of greatest interest to him—Berlin, nuclear armaments, and trade—that he really warmed up.

Khrushchev's evident desire to have his full say on these subjects was, I believe, one of two main reasons that our talk ran as long as it did. The other reason was indicated in his reply to my statement that on everything except medical cooperation I was in Moscow unofficially, as an individual who did not speak for the American Government or even for the Democratic Party. "I know that you do not decide these affairs," Khrushchev answered, "but you will play a part. You are a member of the Democratic majority and a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee." He knew all about the Democratic victory in the last elections, and I suspect that any other member of the enlarged Senate majority would have been welcomed as cordially as I was. A third reason for the length of our discussion may have been simply that there was much to talk about. Certainly I was not bored and Khrushchev clearly wanted me to stay for a dinner that had not been planned.

Before quoting the passage that best indicates Khrushchev's mood on Berlin, I wish to make it completely clear that his remarks neither frightened me nor altered my conviction that the United States and its allies can preserve free Berlin without war if they define a sound position and maintain it without wavering. With this said, I quote Khrushchev:

"Now the three powers want to maintain troops in Berlin, but why? Your troops in Berlin are of no importance unless you want to make war. Why do you maintain this thorn? A free city, a free Berlin, could lead to the breaking of the ice between the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A."

He became very firm and his voice rose as he continued: "Some of your military men have made stupid statements lately, statements to the effect that the United States will break through with tanks if the East German Republic tries to get in the way. The Soviets have tanks, too, lots of them, and I warn you that we will use them. We have rockets, too, and we don't even have to fire them from East Germany. We can send them from the U.S.S.R. So don't threaten me by talking about breaking through with tanks. Might does not make right. Right makes might. The military argument is no answer. Our troops are not the ones to play cards, our tanks are not there to show you the way to Berlin. We mean business. Unless there is an agreement satisfactory to the Soviet Union, the Soviet Union will carry through as it has suggested."

To Khrushchev it clearly was intolerable that thousands of American, British, and French troops should be based in Berlin, in the heart of a Communist country. "It is a bone in my throat," he said, and I am sure that he meant it.

It was during this part of the discussion that Khrushchev jabbed his forefinger at me and said several times (in reference to the United States, of course), "Don't you threaten me." But it was said in a tone of restrained emotion, not of bluster, and a little later Khrushchev was also saying, "I have the deepest respect for President Eisenhower, I like President Eisenhower. We want no evil to the United States or to free Berlin. You must assure the President of this."

KHRUSHCHEV'S CHILBLAIN TREATMENT

When Khrushchev made this kind of switch, I thought of my late father-in-law in South Dakota and the way he treated chilblains. He put his feet first in cold water, then in hot water. I was getting the Communist chilblain treatment from Dr. Khrushchev.

Next to Berlin, the topic that appeared to concern Khrushchev most was nuclear armament. Reviewing all that he said about it, I judge that he wanted to convey three principal points: (1) the Soviet Union now has a superabundance of atomic and hydrogen bombs of all sizes, and the missiles to deliver them anywhere it chooses; (2) the Soviet Union seriously wants an agreement to suspend further tests of nuclear weapons and may make some concessions in order to get it; and (3) the Soviet Union has no intention of agreeing to anything that will restrict its ability to deliver surprise attacks.

The subject of nuclear weapons came up in connection with the current United States-Soviet negotiations at Geneva on the suspension of tests and the prevention of surprise attack.

Khruchchev said that he was troubled by the American offer to suspend tests for a year while a permanent agreement is being worked out. "Whom are you trying to fool?" he said. "You know that it takes almost a year to set up a new series of tests. Your proposal is no proposal at all. It is a fraud." I explained that this part of our proposal was a demonstration of good faith, a show of willingness to proceed on trust until a satisfactory control system is evolved. He did not appear to be convinced. But he said that he agreed, and had already instructed his delegation, that a single document should cover both the agreement to suspend in principle and the controls adopted to enforce suspension—an important concession, in my view.

The American suggestion that a certain number of tests for peaceful purposes be exempted from any suspension agreement also bothered Khrushchev. He repeated the familiar argument that all nuclear tests have some military value and said with much emphasis that he preferred "no explosions at all." But if some had to be allowed in order to reach an agreement, "your side and our side must have an equal number." This was one of many indications that equality with the United States in all things—and American acceptance of the Soviet Union as an equal—is of great importance to Khrushchev. "Look how you always put us in the minority," he complained at another point, referring to the Soviet position in the U.N. "If anything is to be accomplished, there must be agreement between the Great Powers."

In a similar vein, he implied that the United States should be discussing questions of outer space directly with the Soviet Union instead of raising them in the U.N. "So now," Khrushchev said, "the United States discusses outer space with Guatemala—but Guatemala does not seem to be too advanced in outer-space science."

I repeat that the Soviet Union cannot always expect to have its own way. Cooperation requires concessions and adjustments. "You give a formidable reply," Khrushchev said, "but what can we do? We have made many proposals to make a start on agreements with the United States, but they are always rejected."

He dismissed the Geneva negotiations on surprise attack with the accusation that the United States was merely seeking military intelligence and had no real desire for an agreement. "Your delegation has only one purpose: to spy on the Soviet Union," he said. When I answered that the Soviet Union was "too suspicious," he dropped the subject.

Talking about the Soviet Union's wealth in nuclear bombs, Khrushchev said it had so many that he was thinking of diverting some fissionable materials to industrial uses. At this point he told me about the now famous five-megaton bomb. "I am going to tell you a secret," he said. In his most serious tone he then said that Soviet scientists had recently developed "a 5-million-ton bomb" using less than one-tenth of the fissionable material that previously would have been required to produce an explosion of this magnitude.

"That is very interesting," I said, indicating to Khrushchev that I was not overly impressed.

I knew enough about the subject to realize that his reference to the amount of material used in the bomb was more significant than the explosive capacity he claimed. He was suggesting that the Soviet Union has a superbomb that can be carried in a relatively small warhead.

Khrushchev led with equal skill into his other big "secret," his 8,700-mile missile. The discussion had shifted from bombs to trade, and he explained rather loftily that the Soviet Union has no need to buy military weapons or materials from the United States. Suddenly he laughed and said, as if making a great joke, "Maybe we ought to have competition on rockets." Watching me carefully, he continued, "You know, we are having trouble testing our intercontinental ballistic missiles. They shoot too far. Now you Americans, you have lots of space to shoot your rockets, but we are short of space."

"Well," I said, going along with his mood, "if you are having all this trouble, we will be glad to test your rockets for you." "Nothing doing," he replied. Only Soviet technicians could run his rockets. Then he got to his point: "You know, I will tell you something that you do not know and your government doesn't know. We have a new one that we haven't been able to test adequately. We have to test it in stages." He then said that it was a missile with a range of 14,000 kilometers (8,700 miles). His reference to testing it "in stages" may have meant that it had not actually been fired the full distance. I did not ask.

When he proceeded to rib me on the general superiority in weapons that he claimed for the Soviet Union, I told him flatly that we were fully satisfied with ours, too.

Khrushchev brought his argument for expanded trade and economic rather than military competition between the Soviet Union and the Western Powers into most of the situations we discussed. Why not compete economically instead of through NATO? Why not substitute economic competition for the present conflict over Berlin? "Let's test our mutual strength by economic competition," he said again and again.

Naturally, I am all for economic competition—but only so long as it does not weaken the Western economic and military alliance. Khrushchev would like to see the United States slacken its military defenses, and he would like to see the NATO alliance crumble and split, in the delusion that trade and his brand of economic competition would make military precautions unnecessary. I trust that nobody falls for this line, but I was interested in the persistence and skill with which he pursued it.

If I do say so, one of my replies was also interesting. I told him that a lot of young and vigorous Democrats, fellows who made me look like an old man (I'm 47), were coming up and that things would be very different after the 1960 elections. "Mr. Premier," I said, "you and your system have been living on borrowed time. You have just had it easy with the Republicans. Just wait until the Democrats come in. You want economic competition? We'll run you right out of Gorki Park."

"I welcome it," Khrushchev said, smiling as if I had made a joke. We were both in good humor at the time, but I was not joking.

One of the few subjects that Khrushchev was reluctant to discuss was Communist China and his government's relations with it. When I edged up to the subject he said, "Nyet, nyet. You are a subtle man, you are trying to trap me into talking about China. They are our allies, our good relations," and here he stopped. I then said that without getting him "into the ally business," I'd like to ask just one question: what did he thinks of the new communes, the centers of compulsory communal living that Mao Tse-tung was forcing upon China? With this, Khrushchev made possibly the most interesting statement of the whole interview.

"They are old-fashioned, they are reactionary," he said of the communes. "We tried that right after the revolution. It just doesn't work. That system is not nearly so good as the state farms and the collective farms.

"You know, Senator, what those communes are based on? They are based on that principle, 'From each according to his abilities, to each according to his needs.' You know that won't work. You can't get production without incentive."

I felt as if I were about to fall out of my chair. Here was the leader of world communism rejecting the very core of Marxist theory. It was as if I, a life-long Christian, had said that the Golden Rule just would not work.

"That is rather capitalistic," I commented, speaking of his reference to the need for incentive.

"Call it what you will," Khrushchev replied. "It works."

Shortly afterward the Peking government announced that the further spread of the commune system was being slowed down.

A HINT OF COMING EVENTS

Khrushchev called another shot without naming the target. He said that he intended to diminish the secret police forces and reduce the numbers of Soviet policemen in the Kremlin and elsewhere. "There are going to be significant changes in the police," he said. A few days later I read that Gen. Ivan A. Serov, chief of state security, who was thought to be one of Khrushchev's closest supporters, had been removed.

The gulf between Khrushchev and me was never wider than when we got into a debate over the nature of capitalism and socialism (meaning Soviet communism). Our argument forcefully reminded me that we need more anti-Communist Americans who can talk the language of Marxism with Marxists. Certainly I am going to review my early reading of Marx and Engels before I return to the Soviet Union (as I hope to do). As it was, Khrushchev and I were talking different political languages. I told him that he was sadly misinformed as to how American capitalism really works and he told me Americans "just plain don't understand us." His remark included a remarkable statement of the Communist idea of freedom:

"In the U.S.S.R. there is freedom," Khrushchev said. "In the capitalist world there is freedom of enterprise, freedom just to take care of yourself. In the U.S.S.R. freedom means every member taking care of all the others. The citizen of the U.S.S.R. regards the country's welfare as his own welfare. This needs to be understood. As a religious man believes in God, so does a citizen of a Socialist country depend on the welfare of the country as a whole. You believe in God and you believe that your welfare is really in the hands of God. We believe the individual's welfare is the welfare of the state and is in the hands of the state."

Khrushchev spoke with varying degrees of approval of several prominent Americans. When I referred to President Eisenhower as a man of integrity, Khrushchev agreed: "He is a very honest man who wants peace." Ex-President Truman got a mixed and oddly familiar mention: "I did not like Truman, I did not like Truman's policies, but Truman did make decisions." The newspaper reports that Adlai Stevenson and Walter Lippmann wrote after interviewing Khrushchev were "the best of the worst." Even a recent speech by Vice President NIXON came in for warm approval: Khrushchev thought the Vice President's call upon the West to put more effort into economic competition with the Soviet Union was just fine.

Khrushchev spoke of Secretary of State Dulles with bitterness and disdain. "I am sorry that the policies of the United States are made by Dulles," Khrushchev said. "He is a man of a very special kind of character. This is your own internal matter, but that is not only my view. Throughout the whole world he is regarded in the same way. It is not just I who do not like Mr. Dulles. If you don't think so, read the British press and the French press and the press of other countries. However I will tell you that the Soviet Union will survive. We have survived many secretaries of state."

At one point Khrushchev characterized Mr. Dulles as "imperialist" and "warlike," and I sharply disagreed. If that were so, I said, President Eisenhower would not have him as his Secretary of State and the people wouldn't have him, either. "Let us hear no more of this," I said, and we heard no more of it.

Khrushchev once ticked me off in somewhat the same fashion. We had been talking about colonialism and I remarked that, after all, Americans were "the original anti-colonials."

"We will not speak of this, we may disagree," Khrushchev said.

Khrushchev used some of his harshest language—but in a tone of gleeful good humor—when he discussed President Eisenhower's rejection last July of a request for credits to finance Soviet purchases of consumer goods in the United States. Khrushchev said that in our propaganda we had been telling the Soviet people how badly off they were and how sorry Americans were for them, and that he "just got tired of it." So he wrote a personal letter to President Eisenhower, requesting the credits. Khrushchev continued that he was delighted when the President rejected the request. "You helped me," he said. "You showed my people that you did not really care about them. You walked right into it. You were stupid, you were fools!"

He then recalled that Peter the Great had been very grateful to King Charles XII of Sweden for defeating the Russian armies time after time in the 18th century. Peter, finally forced to modernize his armies in order to defeat the Swedes, later felt that Charles had done him a great favor. The United States, Khrushchev implied, had done the Soviet Union the same kind of favor with its embargoes and other restrictions by "compelling us to depend on our own resources."

We had been talking without pause for 4 hours, when, at 7, Khrushchev said, "Let's go to the toilet." During this interlude, while Khrushchev was in the private dressing quarters that adjoin his office, I said to Troyanovsky that "I have been here far too long," but the interpreter said I should not leave unless Khrushchev suggested it. Instead of bidding me goodby, Khrushchev proposed that we have a snack in the office and continue our talk. "We will be like you Americans, off the record," he said. That was my cue to stop taking notes, and we talked for the next 3 hours with the understanding that what was said would not be reported. However, nothing of great moment was lost to history. Berlin and Geneva negotiations were never once mentioned, for example.

It was obvious from the scurrying of office aides and waiters that no meal had been planned. We proceeded from small sandwiches of bologna, cheese, and crabmeat through caviar and fresh fruits to broiled slices of beef and a fowl I never did identify. Khrushchev had told me earlier that he had kidney trouble, and during dinner he drank only mineral water, tea, and one small glass of Armenian brandy. I had mineral water, coffee, and a single glass of brandy.

At around 9 o'clock I remarked that I had met Anastas Mikoyan at a diplomatic reception, and Khrushchev said a talk with him about trade and economic competition would be good for me. Thereupon he pressed a button on his desk. When nobody responded, he pressed another button. An aide who appeared from the outer office was told to find Mikoyan. A few moments later he reported that the deputy premier was on the way from his home. I judged from this sequence of button work that Khrushchev expects Mikoyan and presumably other Soviet ministers to be around at any hour, and that when they are in their offices he summons them by buzzer.

Mikoyan arrived within 15 minutes and for another 2 hours the three of us carried on the same sort of discussion that I have already reported. The hands of the clock on the office wall pointed to 11:25 when Mikoyan stood up and said, "I am tired. It is time to go home." As far as I could tell when I said goodby to Nikita Khrushchev he would have been good for another 8 hours if his deputy minister had not broken up the party.

INAUGURAL ADDRESS BY HON. GAYLORD NELSON, GOVERNOR OF WISCONSIN

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on Monday, January 5, a new Democratic administration took office in Wisconsin. For the first time in 25 years my State elected a Democratic Governor. As a citizen of Wisconsin, as well as a Democrat, I am very proud of the unusual ability of the newly elected constitutional officers in my State.

The new Governor of Wisconsin, Gaylord Nelson, has already demonstrated a high degree of intelligence, imagination, idealism, and aggressiveness as a 10-year member of the State Senate. I am convinced, Mr. President, that Governor Nelson is destined to become not only one of the finest Governors of Wisconsin's history, but one of the outstanding chief executives in this country.

As an indication of the remarkable competency of the new chief executive of my State, I ask unanimous consent that the superb inaugural address which he delivered on January 5 in the State Capitol at Madison be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On this 5th day of January, 1959, I am happy to greet all of you—friends, neighbors, and good citizens of Wisconsin. I appreciate the great honor you have conferred upon me and I assure you in all humility that I am keenly aware of the responsibility that goes with that honor. I must confess to you, however, that I am really ill prepared with words to express my feelings adequately.

I am here today to speak briefly about the future—the future of Wisconsin and its citizens. But first may I say to those who supported me—I shall work hard to justify your confidence. To those who were disappointed in the outcome I give my assurance that this administration will work unceasingly to promote the welfare of all the people of Wisconsin. No group, large or small, will be favored over any other.

In almost every formal speech on important occasions the speaker likes to tell us that we now stand at some great crossroads. The direction we take, he informs us, will determine the fate of mankind for all time to come. This kind of speechmaking has been going on for many centuries. Strangely, if not humorously, each of our speakers knows the crossroad to take but no two of them agree on which one it must be.

Perhaps each is partly right in his own way. There is no single, simple solution to all of our problems. Furthermore, solutions today become outmoded customs tomorrow. No matter how hard we strive, the affairs of society refuse to be settled with any reasonable degree of finality. Where we have one problem today, we will have two tomorrow. The test of survival for any attempt to advance representative government is how well it meets the challenge of the changing times and the profusion of problems that go with it. This means more than just passively drifting with the forces of change. It means positive creative adaptation to that change. It means utilization of this force to promote the well-being of our citizens. We have it in our power to formulate our purpose and determine our direction.

We live in a dangerous age. In strategic areas of the world the democratic ideals to which we are dedicated are under relentless attack. Many of the problems associated with that struggle are beyond the reach of State government. But it is equally true that the sound and progressive resolution of issues on the State, county, and local levels will go far toward strengthening the inner fortress of freedom. Certainly history confirms the conclusion that a single State, our own State of Wisconsin, made tremendous contributions toward fortifying the social and economic foundations of American life, and thus helped immeasurably to prepare us to withstand the assaults against our way of life over the past quarter century.

Nor does the threat to democracy come wholly from outside our borders. These words of the late Robert Marion La Follette Sr., are amazingly appropriate today:

"We have long rested comfortably in this country upon the assumption that because our form of Government was democratic, it was therefore automatically producing democratic results. Now, there is nothing mysteriously potent about the forms and names of democratic institutions that should make them self-operative. Tyranny and oppression are just as possible under democratic forms as under any other. We are slow to realize that democracy is a life; and involves continual struggle. It is only as those of every generation who love democracy resist with all their might the encroachments of its enemies that the ideals of representative government can even be nearly approximated."

To these words of the late Robert Marion La Follette, Sr., I would add that political leadership in our system must accept the responsibility to lead. It must respond swiftly and decisively to combat any form of tyranny and oppression. Affirmatively, it must help formulate the purpose, point the direction, and propose the program that will translate the aspirations of our people into reality. This is easy when the cause is popular—difficult when it is not. I hope for the courage to make those hard decisions which distinguish responsible leadership from irresponsible demagoguery.

I do not wish to suggest here that we now stand at one of those mythical crossroads of the future—but I will say to you that we are at a significant moment in our history. The decisions we make now, the actions we take tomorrow and the next day, will permanently affect the welfare of our State and its people. For many reasons there is more urgency in our situation today than at any other time in this century.

Some of the problems we face are of our own making, but many more are the natural outgrowth of an economic, industrial, and cultural revolution which has virtually engulfed us in the past 25 years. Moreover, this revolution, which has set a pace too fast for us to accommodate it, continues to increase its tempo month by month and year by year.

Every year more children enter our schools. Each fall more girls and boys show up at our college doors. Not only are the numbers greater, but the percentage who demand the opportunity increases every year. We must build the buildings, pay the teachers, and help finance the students.

The number, size, and speed of our automobiles has outmoded the highways and congested our city streets.

The rapid growth and expansion of our metropolitan areas has thrown cities, villages, towns, and counties into confusion and conflict.

Advances in science have given us better insight to the problems of mental illness and its treatment. Because of this very fact we face more pressing and justifiable demands for more money, more intensive treatment, and better facilities.

More people and more leisure have put an ever-increasing burden upon our recreation resources. We need more parks and playgrounds, more wetlands, more streams, and more careful husbanding of our wilderness areas.

This is but a fleeting mention of a few of our problems. It gives us just a glimpse of the scope and magnitude of the issue before us.

Unfortunately, we are handicapped in meeting our problems by archaic governmental structures at both the State and local level.

If we are to have the tools for effective action we must bring modern methods and efficient organization to our governmental units.

Another problem, quite as serious as any other, doggedly plagues us at every turn. It is not only a question of how many more dollars we need to provide essential services but, far more puzzling and provocative, where will the dollars come from? This issue will be faced sooner or later whether we like it or not. I propose that we face it now.

We must face this issue head on in two ways. First, by a comprehensive analysis and revision of our tax structure; second, by a vigorous promotion and encouragement of economic growth and industrial expansion. In the long pull our hopes and plans for raising the necessary dollars without increasing taxes too sharply will depend upon our rate of economic growth. Here is our area of hope for the most fruitful effort.

In the meantime, we still face the immediate problem of paying for critically needed services out of a revenue structure producing insufficient dollars.

We can close our eyes but the problem will not go away. To those who would neglect our schools, our colleges, and public welfare activities and institutions, our highways and conservation resources, I say this—you spend more money on cigarettes, liquor, cosmetics, and other luxuries than the total cost of your State government. If we have not completely lost our sense of values in the fast pace of this modern world, then the question in its proper perspective is really this—are you willing to give up a few personal luxuries in exchange for a creative investment in our future?

While the issues I have discussed here speak loudly for the necessity of bold action, I shall not seek action for the sake of motion or change for the sake of doing something different. Rather, I simply suggest that we can reflect with Lincoln that "The dogmas of the quiet past are inadequate to the story present. We must think anew and act anew."

To meet our problems I shall, in the course of time, make a series of important proposals for action by the Legislature. They will be made in a nonpartisan spirit, and I am hopeful they will be weighed and considered in the same spirit. The major problem areas I have mentioned today are nonpartisan in character. While we all may have differences over the approach to a solution, our differences, I hope, will be on the merits arising from honest individual conviction.

I would ask only two things of the citizens of Wisconsin: When you believe we are right, support us; when you believe we are wrong, oppose us; but let us all have a free and open discussion of our problems so that we can work toward an honest adjustment of our differences without sacrifice of principles. This is the key to every successful democratic society the world has known.

In these requests I ask no more of my political opponents than of my friends. If each of you will support our proposals as far as your own conscience carries you and halt opposition at the border of mere partisanship, the gain will be great for the citizens of our State.

An exciting and challenging future lies before us. The decisions made this year will provide the impetus for the progress of the future or the chains that will shackle us to the dogmas of the quiet past.

I can think of no better expression of our situation than the words written by Franklin D. Roosevelt before his death: "The only limit to our realization of tomorrow will be our doubts of today. Let us move forward with a strong and active faith."

This is the note on which I would end—that we move forward with a strong and active faith to build today for a better tomorrow. Working together—you who have elected us and we who have been elected—we can make Wisconsin once again the proud pioneer in the quest for a more abundant and more significant life for all our people, whatever their race or color or creed. This is the goal to which I am dedicated as I assume the office of Governor of Wisconsin.

RULE XXII

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an excellent editorial entitled "Rule XXII," which was published in the Evening Star of Wednesday, January 7, 1959.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The most important issue which will have to be faced at the outset of the 86th Congress, opening today, is concerned with the fate of something known as Senate rule XXII—the so-called filibuster rule.

At stake are two sections of this rule. One, on the theory that the Senate is a continuing body, provides that its rules carry over from one Congress to the next, and that debate on a proposal to change the rules cannot be limited. The other section provides that debate on any proposal except a rules change can be limited only if two-thirds of all the Members vote for such action.

Thus, at the outset, the "liberal" Senators are faced with two problems. Unless there is some kind of compromise, they must wear out a filibuster against a proposal to change rule XXII, or they must find some hitherto undiscovered parliamentary device for getting around it. Then, assuming that the unlimited debate phase of the rule is changed, they must persuade the Senate to adopt a modified cloture, or debate limitation, rule.

As a practical matter, the choice probably will come down to a decision between the positions taken by Majority Leader LYNDON JOHNSON and Senator PAUL DOUGLAS, of Illinois. Senator JOHNSON favors a change by which cloture could be invoked by two-thirds of the Senators actually present and voting. The Douglas proposal, in the last analysis, would permit cloture by a simple majority vote. As between the two, we think Senator JOHNSON's plan is greatly to be preferred.

The Senators who support the Douglas plan say that they are doing so in the interests of securing civil rights. No doubt they are sincere. But there are at least two good reasons for looking with grave misgiving on their approach.

One is that this majority rule formula is a two-edged sword. Today it may cut through procedural obstructions to what a liberal majority thinks of as desirable civil rights laws—laws designed to improve the lot of minority groups. But rule by a majority of one, can be, and often has been, an instrument of oppression. Furthermore, the political coloration of majorities is subject to change. If in the future the reactionaries should get control of the Senate, we suspect that the liberal Senators, and the minority population groups, would take a very dim view of simple majority rule.

The second and perhaps more important reason has to do with the nature of the immediate objectives of the rule changers. They believe and they probably are right that, given simple majority rule, they can pass much tougher legislation directed against resistance in the South to integration and other civil rights measures. For our part, we doubt that such tough legislation would be wise or desirable. It is one thing to pass tough laws which may have a vote-getting appeal outside the South. It is something else to enforce those laws without violent upheavals which, in the long run, could do much harm to the legitimate objectives of a civil rights program.

It may be undemocratic, un-American, or what have you, to argue, in today's circumstances, against majority rule. Nevertheless we hope that the Senate will not let itself be stampeded or pressured into accepting a simple majority limitation on debate—a change which could plague this country for a long time to come.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceeding under the call be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Chair state the pending business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, Senate Resolution 5.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 5) proposing to amend Senate rules XXII and XXXII.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I am prepared to vote on Senate Resolution 5. In the Senate we have discussed a proposed rule change every year for several years. It has been 10 years since rule XXII was revised.

I am informed some of my colleagues desire to deliberate in private before concluding just what course will be followed in connection with certain amendments. I am also informed many Senators would like to be free this evening to attend certain meetings they have arranged. But I am hopeful the Senate can proceed with dispatch on this very important matter and try to resolve it.

We have followed a rather circuitous route thus far. We have acknowledged that some rules exist, and contended that some do not. We have exercised points of order under rule XL, and required my resolution, Senate Resolution 5, to go over 1 day. Then the next day some Senators contended there were no rules at all.

What Senate Resolution 5 does is very plain, it is very simple, and everyone can understand it. It says cloture shall be applied and can be invoked as to any rule change—and that meets one serious criticism of the rule. It says that the constitutional two-thirds vote now required shall be changed to two-thirds of those present and voting. That is very clear. It provides that the Senate rules shall continue from one Congress to another. That is simple.

Committees have given days, weeks, and months of hearings to this matter. I think every Senator knows how he is going to vote, and has known since he came here. There have been great pressures attempted to be applied on certain persons, trying to get them to embrace a certain philosophy. I have been in the Senate for more than 10 years. I have not seen any votes changed except as a result of discussion and debate and committee consideration.

I hope those who really earnestly and genuinely desire relief under rule XXII, instead of having it as an issue, will come to the floor and discuss the subject, and that we shall not have to waste time with quorum calls. We can continue the session into the evening. Senators can offer any amendments they wish to offer. Any time any Senator desires to have Senate Resolution 5 amended he can accomplish that, if he can get a majority of his colleagues to vote with him. I believe we can get a vote on the resolution. I think we can vote on it today, if those who oppose it are willing to have a vote, or on any substitutes they desire to submit.

I am prepared to enter into a unanimous-consent agreement on the majority vote proposal, the substitute which would provide for a majority vote, if that is agreeable to the proponents.

I understand there is going to be advanced a proposal on germaneness. I am willing to have a unanimous-consent agreement on that.

I understand there is going to be advanced a three-fifths vote proposal. We could get a unanimous-consent agreement on that.

I think it is important that the Members of the Senate who have made plans not be called upon to follow a course if they do not know where it leads. I think if Senators do not want to have the resolution voted on they should simply say so, as they did last night. It can go over and not be voted on today.

I do not want to mislead anyone, but I do want to transact business. I want to amend rule XXII, if a majority of the Senate wants to amend it. I am one who believes the rule ought to be amended. I have made my recommendations. I am willing to listen to the recommendations of any other Senator and help him get a record vote on any proposal he may desire to advance.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I certainly am sympathetic with the majority leader in his desire to expedite the matter, but I should like to ask if he is prepared to state at this time whether he contemplates a session on Saturday, tomorrow.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Unless we have finished this resolution we do. We announced that yesterday and today.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. The reason I ask is that I have an engagement at some distance, which I fixed especially 2 months ago for the first Saturday of the session, thinking, so far as I was concerned, it would be unprecedented if we had a meeting on Saturday. I felt safe in making the engagement. I of course stand ready to do whatever I have to do here.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I would dislike very much to inconvenience the Senator. I think he acted reasonably, and he had a right to expect that he would be able to keep the engagement.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. It is not so much a question of my inconvenience as it is a question of the inconvenience of other people, who are relying on me. I assured them there would be no question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If we could obtain a vote this afternoon, this evening, or tonight we would not have a Saturday session. Otherwise, we plan to have the Senate meet at 10 a.m. tomorrow. The Senate has already entered an order to do that.

I do not want anyone to question my good faith, and I know the Senator from Iowa does not. I do not mean to imply the Senator does. I am sincere about trying to amend rule XXII. I think the best way to get it amended is to have the Senate meet early, to stay late, to stay on the job, to discuss the matter, to make any proposals Senators desire to make, to vote on them, and to let the majority resolve the issue.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I hope the majority leader understands I am perfectly willing to stay.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I understand.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. It is a matter of some embarrassment, but that is beside the point with me. It is only a question of timeliness, as to when I shall know whether I can leave this evening or tomorrow morning.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I will give the Senator the information as soon as I have it. We have planned a Saturday session in the event we do not finish this evening. How many amendments will be offered I do not know.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I understand the situation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I will inform the Senator as soon as I hear from some colleagues about the amendments they may want to offer.

Mr. JAVITS rose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to my colleague, the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I have some amendments to offer and some things to say. If the majority leader desires to yield the floor, I will seek the floor in my own right.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is it the intention of the majority leader to make an affirmative argument for Senate Resolution 5, or is he going to press for a vote without any affirmative argument on Senate Resolution 5?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from Texas has made affirmative arguments several times. The Senator from Illinois can read them if he did not care to hear them or was not present to hear them. The Senator from Texas did that when he submitted the resolution, and he has done it again today. He reserves the right to control his own speech in such a manner as he may determine to be in the best interests of the country and of the Senate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I know the Senator from Texas will do that, but I also observe he is pushing for a very quick vote. I think the Senate and the country would be interested in a rather full explanation of the reasons why the Senator believes his resolution is superior to all the other alternatives.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Why this resolution is superior?

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the Senator does not do that, then some of us who favor other methods will be compelled to deal with his resolution. We would prefer, in the interest of fair play, that the Senator should make his own case for the proposal, rather than for us to come forward with a negative attack upon it in the beginning.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the Senator——

Mr. DOUGLAS. In other words, we would normally expect that those presenting the resolution would argue in some detail the alleged merits of the proposal which the Senator from Texas is advancing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. And if they did argue it in very much detail it would be criticized as being a southern filibuster.

Mr. DOUGLAS. No; not at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I suggest that the Senator from Illinois attempt to guide himself and control his own conduct without attempting to direct the activities of his colleagues.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was not trying to guide the activities of the Senator from Texas in the slightest. In the first place, I would have no desire to do so. In the second place, I know I would be completely ineffective if I did offer such suggestions.

I thought possibly the Senator from Texas, feeling his high obligation to the tradition of the Senate, would not try to railroad his proposal through——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Oh, the Senator——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Just a moment, please—without an adequate explanation as to what it is he is proposing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. First, I will say to the Senator that I do not know how long it takes to explain a thing to him, but the resolution has been explained in two speeches since it was submitted in this Congress. The speeches may not have had the quality the Senator from Illinois would expect, but they represented my best efforts.

Second, I say to the Senator for his information, that the resolution is in identical form with one previously submitted. I thought perhaps, if the Senator were really genuinely determined to get rule XXII amended—if he wanted an amendment instead of an issue—he would support it some 2 years ago. It has been presented for 2 years, for anyone who wanted to consider it. It is only a few lines long. I will explain it again for the Senator if he wants me to do so.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think I understand what it is.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If the Senator understands it why does he want to postpone a vote? What purpose is served by trying to deliberately stall a vote? I do not care whether we have the vote tonight or whether we have the vote tomorrow or whether we have the vote Monday. If the Senator wants to stall things and prolong them and will so inform me, then I will tell my colleagues, as I did last night, that there are Senators who do not desire a vote at the present time.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is very interesting.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. They do not want to face up to this issue they have been talking about. They want to talk about it some more.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. I will say that the Senator is being very politic. If the position now being taken by my distinguished friend from Illinois were taken by a Senator from a southern State, cries of "filibuster" would already be rising to the heavens and would be going out over the airwaves and printed in the press.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have already observed that, and I think it is accurate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If the Senator wants me to yield and will ask me, I will be glad to yield.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. ERVIN. I will say to the able and distinguished senior Senator from Georgia, those who disagree with him and me do follow a precedent set by one of the southerners.

North Carolina at one time had a governor, who also once served in the Senate. His name was Zeb Vance. Zeb Vance was at one time discussing religious professions of people, what people professed to believe in religion and how religious professions sometimes did not coincide with practices. He said, "Take my brother Bob Vance"—who, incidentally, was a Representative in Congress. He said, "My brother Bob is a Methodist. He believes in falling from grace, in accordance with the old Methodist doctrine, but he never falls. I am a Presbyterian. I do not believe in falling from grace, but I am always falling."

I have been in the Senate for 4½ years, and I have observed a curious paradox during that time. Senators who are, as we say in North Carolina, "low rated" as those who love filibusters are Senators who are Spartanlike in their speeches on the floor of the Senate. They speak in a very laconic manner, whereas Senators who profess to abhor filibusters the most are the most loquacious in their speeches on the floor of the Senate. In other words, they emulate the good example of our Governor and Senator, Zeb Vance. They do not believe in falling from grace and indulging in filibusters, but they are always doing it.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I am prepared to make a unanimous-consent request for next week, if that is satisfactory to the Senate. I should like to see if the minority would be willing to agree to have a session on Saturday, and a session on Monday, and proceed to vote on amendments after the morning hour on Monday, with 2 hours allotted to each amendment. I make such a unanimous consent request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I wonder if the eminent and distinguished Senator from Texas would be willing to clarify his request a bit. Is he proposing that there be 2 hours on Monday on each amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. And how much time on final passage?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Whatever is desirable—perhaps an hour to a side. Senators have heard these questions thoroughly discussed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wonder if the Senator from Texas would be willing to write out his proposal, so that we may see whether or not there is any fine print in it, and be able to study it in some detail.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I shall be glad to do that, if the Senator can see better than he can hear. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think it is always important to study the fine print in a document submitted by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator reminds me of an old friend in the mountains of Texas. He was called Uncle Ezra. He went to see his doctor because he had great difficulty with his hearing. The doctor said it seemed that he was consuming too much alcohol—I do not associate the Senator from Illinois with alcohol—and that he would have to cut down on his drinking.

Uncle Ezra went home, and returned a month or two later. He said, "Doctor, my hearing is getting worse all the time."

The doctor said, "Uncle Ezra, did you cut down on your drinking?"

Uncle Ezra replied, "No; I have stepped it up a little."

The doctor said, "You are not following my instructions."

Uncle Ezra replied, "No."

"Why are you not following my instructions?" asked the doctor.

"Well," said Uncle Ezra, "I like what I drink so much better than what I hear." [Laughter.]

It may be that the Senator from Illinois likes what he sees much better than what he hears. However, I have been laboring under the assumption that Senators were seriously and genuinely interested in amending rule XXII. I realized that when Congress convened this year that would be the first order of business. I plead with Senators to roll up their sleeves and get on with the job. I am prepared to do so.

I reiterate my request. I ask the Parliamentarian to write it down, or type it, if necessary, and present it to the Senator from Illinois. I ask the Parliamentarian to be sure that it is written in the largest print available, because the Senator from Illinois has difficulty in seeing the fine print.

The request is that, following the morning hour on Monday, there be 2 hours on each amendment, to be equally divided between the proponents of the amendment and the majority leader, if he is opposed to it, or the minority leader if the majority leader is in favor of it; and that there be 2 hours on the resolution, to be equally divided.

I believe anyone can understand that request without reading it. But if not, we shall have it written and submitted. I hope it will be agreeable to all Senators. If so, we shall remain in session, as we did last evening with the cooperation of my friend from Oregon [Mr. MORSE].

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. I missed the Senator from Texas very much last night. I had much to say to him. I think he owes me a cup of coffee for making it possible for him to keep his social engagement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I was here when the Senator concluded. My social engagement was at my desk, answering letters. I always use my time as profitably as possible. I was at my desk when the bell rang. I was there an hour or so later.

I appreciate the cooperation of the Senator from Oregon. He does not always agree with me. He is not always correct. I do not find him correct this year as he was so often last year. I do not know what the fall season did to him. But he does say where he stands, and we know how to plan. If we can obtain an agreement with him, we know that it will be kept.

Yesterday he said that he did not intend to have the Senate vote until he had concluded his remarks, and he did not intend to conclude his remarks until the cool of the evening. I knew what that meant. I realize that I could have made a motion to table, and cut him off, but I would have been cutting myself off at the same time, and I did not choose to do that. I think a great deal of the Senator from Oregon, but I also think a great deal of myself. We shall have to work together all year. I have learned that in this world one gets just about what he gives. I have a little Golden Rule charm on my watch—"Do unto others as you would have them do unto you."

I thought that if I had a speech on this subject and wished to make it, and the Senator from Oregon had a motion to table, I would expect the Senator from Oregon to reserve his motion to lay on the table until I had made my speech. So I extended to him the same courtesy I would have expected for myself.

If Senators have speeches they desire to make, I am prepared to keep the Senate in session late this evening. The Senate will meet at 10 o'clock in the morning, under the order previously entered. We plan to keep the Senate in session late tomorrow evening—until midnight, if necessary. The Senate will assemble early Monday morning. At the conclusion of the morning hour we can have a unanimous-consent agreement providing for 2 hours on each amendment, the time to be equally divided, and 2 hours on the resolution, to be equally divided.

I do not know of anything that would be fairer than that. The people of the country ought to know that we intend to give every Senator an opportunity to vote on proposed amendments to rule XXII. Any Senator can have any amendment adopted at any time if he has a majority vote. That is simple. People can understand that. We are going to pull the curtain back and take all the decorations and illusions away. We are going to remove what I sometimes think might be considered hypocrisy, and say to Senators, "If you want to amend this rule you can amend it at any time you have an amendment which can command a majority vote."

I have found experienced Senators, who have been in Congress more than 20 years, telling me that they thought it required as many votes to change the rules as would be required to impeach a President. I said, "That is just not so. Read rule XL."

I do not wish to reflect on my colleagues. Not many of them said that to me, but at least two of them told me that. Even after reading rule XL they still thought so, and stated that they would have to debate the question with me on Monday.

One of them called me and said, "I have read it and have had it briefed. You are correct." He cast his vote with me today for that very reason. He had been laboring under the illusion that it required two-thirds of the Senators sworn to amend the rules. There is no such requirement.

I think there is an imperfection in rule XXII. I am convinced that we ought to have cloture in connection with a rule change; and we are going to get it if we can only vote on the question.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am sure the Senator will have no difficulty with his unanimous-consent agreement; but he must be a little tolerant in this connection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from Texas is always tolerant.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator is always tolerant.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I know that he will be characteristically tolerant today. After all, for many years the Senate has been operating under the system of unlimited debate with reference to rules. Even to those of us who believe in majority rule procedure, it is quite a shock to be confronted with a proposal to cut off debate suddenly. We would like the transfer from the extreme of unlimited debate to the cutoff of debate to be accomplished by a reasonable proposal, such as the one the Senator is advancing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I do not want the wrong impression to go out to the country. I am reminded of an old cow I used to milk. I would get the pail full, and then she would drag her tail through it and ruin all the milk. I do not want any of my colleagues to get the impression that I am trying to cut off debate. I am not trying to do that at all. Two of my colleagues in the Senate desire to know what my plan is, and I am sure that the other 95 Senators would also like to know the plan. I should like to find out what the desires of my colleagues are, but I certainly do not desire to talk any more. I am willing to enter into an agreement. If the Senator from Minnesota wishes to talk for a week, I am willing to withdraw my request. In that case it will be his responsibility. If the Senator from Illinois wishes to talk for a long time, I am willing to withdraw my request for his benefit also. If the Senator from New York desires to talk at great length, I am willing to withdraw my proposed agreement. The same goes for any other Senator. I am sure that will include also the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND].

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The good Senator from Texas knows full well that the Senator from Minnesota has always been in favor of expediting the business of the Senate, and that I have been in favor of entering into such arrangements to that end ever since I came to the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am sure the Senator has been.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Let us get that on the RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I agree with the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The good Senator from Texas knows also that this sudden burst of enthusiasm for modifying the rules is just a little more than some of us who have starved on the rules diet can take all at once.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I assure the Senator from Minnesota that this is not a sudden burst. It is something which was proposed in the Senate 2 years ago. If the Senator wishes to call it a burst, and if for any reason he wishes to delay a vote on the matter, I am willing to delay it.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Texas knows—and I say this in all good humor—that he has been told that the Douglas proposal would be called up as a substitute, and that we hoped we would be successful with the Douglas substitute. I also indicated that if we were unable to have that proposal substituted, other amendments would be offered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator indicated before the lunch hour that he was not sure his proposal would be called up. I should like to enter into an agreement. If the Senator does not want to vote——

Mr. HUMPHREY. I wish the Senator would not try to put words in my mouth. We are prepared to agree on a time limitation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. What time would the Senator suggest?

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator's proposal is an excellent one. Speaking only for myself, I do not object to the unanimous-consent request. The sooner we stop arguing about details and tidbits, such as who will bring up amendments, the better off we will be.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I could not agree more with the Senator from Minnesota about anything.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I say we should get back to the job of running the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. We are in complete agreement.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I may say to the distinguished and able senior Senator from Texas that it is my understanding—and I hope he will correct me if I am wrong—that he had a conference with another Senator, a very able Member of this body, immediately after the President's address today, in which he said he would try to get a vote this afternoon; that he did not intend to make a long statement himself, and that he wanted to get the whole matter over with today. If I am in error as to that conversation, I will withdraw the statement, and it will not be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from Illinois is in error. The Senator from Texas wants to get——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Did not the Senator from Texas tell another Member of the Senate that he wanted to get an immediate vote on the whole proposition today?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I should like to have a vote as early as possible.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Did he not say he wanted to get a vote today?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am prepared to give every Member of the Senate such time as he desires or needs to express himself. If Senators will tell me how long they wish to speak, we will multiply the figure by two and make our plans accordingly.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I may say that the Senator from Illinois was raising the question because, on the basis of the alleged conversation, which the Senator from Texas has not yet denied——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have no knowledge at all about any such conversation. I do not know what the Senator from Illinois is talking about. I do not have to resort to rumors or gossip. I wish to have this matter resolved as quickly as possible and as early as possible, consistent with every Member of the Senate having a full opportunity to express himself. The Senator from Minnesota has agreed to the plan I have suggested. He feels it is satisfactory to him. If the Senator from Illinois feels it is acceptable to him, I should like to have him so indicate. Incidentally, I believe the proposed unanimous-consent agreement has been written.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have a copy of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Is it satisfactory to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. DOUGLAS. As I read it, it is satisfactory to me. However, I should like to have the privilege of consulting with some of my colleagues who feel as I do on the subject. Therefore I ask that the Senator from Texas withhold his proposed agreement for about 10 minutes, until we have an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I shall be delighted to do that.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I wish to ask a question only for clarification. After all, some of our Members have engagements out of town, and I should like to avoid as much embarrassment to them as I possibly can with respect to cancellation of engagements, and so forth. I wish to ask the majority leader this question. Is my understanding correct that no votes will be had until Monday?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. There will be none if I can avoid it, certainly none on the merits of the proposal.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I understand that the unanimous-consent agreement is to become effective on Monday.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Not today.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is correct. However, if a Senator moved to expel another Member, and the yeas and nays were requested, and no Senator wished to speak all evening, we might have a vote. The other day, in accordance with custom, we had intended to have a very brief session, and I did not plan to go into great detail in connection with my resolution. I wished to make a brief statement, and then I was going to move to adjourn, so that we could attend parties. Some Senators felt, for some reason or other, that because I did that, it was improper procedure. As nearly as I can control it, there will be no votes until the unanimous-consent agreement goes into effect on Monday, if the agreement is entered into.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Then it is very definite that there will be no votes on any amendment until Monday. Is that correct?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is correct; on any amendment to the resolution.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I can speak only for myself, but I wish to say that in the present state of senatorial felicity and our passion for cloture, this self-imposed cloture proposal is very reasonable and should appeal to the Members of the Senate. However, I certainly would not wish to speak for those who have other ideas.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I appreciate the Senator's yielding to me at this time. Laying aside the pleasantries and bearing in mind the fact that we debated the civil rights bill almost continuously from July 8 to August 29, 1957, and that the proposed rule change has a great deal to do with what may happen to other similar bills, I cannot shed tears over the fact that we seek to debate it for a few days. I do not believe the country should get the impression that we are being unreasonable. I do not understand why those who are fighting bitterly for the right to filibuster should shed crocodile tears now over the fact that we wish to talk for a few days. So much for the country.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I wish to interject, if I still have the floor, that I do not want the country to get any false impression. I am not shedding any tears. I am rather enjoying myself. If I were to shed tears, they would not be crocodile tears. I do not want the Senator to leave the impression that anyone is shedding any kind of tears, at least at my expense.

Mr. JAVITS. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. The Senator from Texas is beloved by all of us, including myself.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. He knows that I was speaking in no personal sense. The Senator from Texas is always gracious and engaging to his colleagues. I appreciate that we must have a schedule, and I am sure that my friends will join us in trying to work the thing out.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I realize that we always have problems on Friday and Saturday.

Mr. JAVITS. I hope Senators, therefore, will bear with us for a few minutes. I desire to introduce some bills. That will take about 10 minutes. I should then be willing to meet with the Senator from Texas and try to arrange a time for a vote which I think will be agreeable.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Would the Senator from New York be willing to withhold his introduction of bills until I have had a chance to try to clarify the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. JAVITS. If the Senator from Illinois will do so on the floor——

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should like to make it a matter of record.

Mr. JAVITS. If the Senator wishes to make the clarification on the floor of the Senate, I think we ought to have a few minutes in which to discuss it among ourselves.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Oh, yes; this should not be regarded as an acceptance.

Mr. JAVITS. As I understand, the majority leader graciously said he would withhold his request.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from Illinois asked me to withhold it. I have no desire to rush the matter. If two or more Senators are not interested in staying here on Friday night and on Saturday, but desire to put the whole matter off until next week and then let it run on ad infinitum, I shall not pursue the matter vigorously. But I have made a proposal. I think it is a wise one. I think we ought to be able to tell Senators whether or not a vote will be taken soon.

Last night many Senators had to cancel engagements in their States. They wired to their States and explained that they were needed on the floor of the Senate. But when it was determined that the Senate could not reach a vote, and we realized that situation, the Senators were so notified, and they made their plans accordingly. As I recall, I myself attended several meetings given in honor of our colleagues.

We shall do the same thing tonight, the same thing tomorrow, and the same thing on Monday, if that is the desire of any Senator. But I thought it might be possible to get a vote tonight. If any Senator wishes to postpone the vote, let him stand up and say so, and we will postpone it.

Mr. President, I had hoped to be able to get an agreement on Senate Resolution 5 and any amendments intended to be proposed to it. If Senators do not want to agree, but simply want to continue to talk about the matter, I will attempt to work out an agreement at some later time.

But I should like all Senators to be on notice that until such an agreement has been obtained, it is the plan of the leadership, if Senators will follow it, to stay late this evening and to come in early tomorrow and stay until we can get a vote.

VISIT TO THE SENATE BY MEMBERS OF THE CANADIAN PARLIAMENT

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, many of us have been looking forward to this day with great pleasure. Senators will recall that on August 8, 1958, the Senate adopted Senate Resolution 359 reading as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations shall establish a subcommittee for the purpose of exploring, with appropriate officials of the Government of the United States and with members of the Canadian Parliament, the desirability and feasibility of increased systematic discussion between legislators of the two countries on problems of common concern.

I shall read two sentences from the committee report of Senate Resolution 359 to indicate the motivation behind the resolution:

It was the feeling of the Committee on Foreign Relations that an attempt should be undertaken to strengthen the bonds between the United States and its great neighbor, the Commonwealth of Canada. In these critical times, it is of crucial importance that the friendship and understanding between our nations be deepened in every possible way.

Mr. President, this Senate resolution did not simply happen. For some years, members of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations and of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs have been keenly aware of the special relationship between the United States and Canada and the useful results which might flow from increased contact between legislators of the two countries. In May, 1957 a report by Representative FRANK M. COFFIN and Representative Brooks Hays suggested that some form of parliamentary consultation between the two countries be established. In a speech at Wesleyan University on June 8, 1958, Prime Minister Diefenbaker referred to this concept. The subject was further discussed last July by the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States.

Pursuant to Senate Resolution 359, I was privileged to be named by Chairman GREEN of the Committee on Foreign Relations to be the chairman of a liaison committee. My colleagues on that committee are Senators MANSFIELD, CAPEHART, and MORSE. Last September I went to Ottawa where I was joined by Senator CAPEHART and we had a preliminary discussion with members of the Canadian Parliament, some of whom are here today. Later in September, Representative Brooks Hays and Representative FRANK M. COFFIN held similar discussions in Canada. As a result of these discussions it was determined that a delegation of members of the Canadian Parliament would come to Washington at this time. Acting Chairman MORGAN of the House Foreign Affairs Committee has appointed a liaison committee composed of Representative EDNA F. KELLY, chairman, and Representatives FRANK COFFIN, WALTER H. JUDD, and CHESTER E. MERROW.

Mr. President, this is in brief the background of the introduction which I am about to make. A delegation of most distinguished members of the Canadian Parliament is now with us to continue the consultations begun in Canada last fall. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point in my remarks certain biographic information about the Canadian delegation.

There being no objection, the biographic information was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, it is indeed a high privilege to present to this body the Speaker of the Senate of Canada, the Honorable Mark Drouin. [Applause, Senators rising.]

Mr. President, it is also a high privilege to present to the Senate the Speaker of the House of Commons of Canada, the Honorable Roland Michener. [Applause, Senators rising.]

Speaker Drouin is accompanied by two of his colleagues, the Honorable Sydney John Smith and the Honorable William R. Brunt. [Applause, Senators rising.]

Speaker Michener of the House of Commons is accompanied by five of his colleagues, the Honorable Lionel Chevrier, the Honorable Hazen Argue, the Honorable William L. Houck, the Honorable Richard D. Thrasher, and the Honorable Erik Nielsen. [Applause, Senators rising.]

Mr. President, if the rules of the Senate permitted it, I would call attention to the fact that the wives of seven members of the Canadian delegation and the daughter of one member are in the gallery. [Applause.]

Mr. President, I know that other Members of the Senate wish to pay their respects to our distinguished guests. I am happy to yield at this time for that purpose; and after they leave the floor, they will go to the office of the Vice President, where other Senators may meet them.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, before I yield to my delightful friend, the Senator from Indiana, I wish to commend the Senator from Vermont for bringing into the Chamber these very able and distinguished Canadian neighbors of ours. There is no nation for which we have more love or affection, and we are pleased beyond compare that they are here to visit with us. I look forward with great anticipation to meeting them in the office of the Vice President, and listening and learning.

I yield now to my friend, the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, last fall I had the pleasure and the good fortune of visiting with these gentlemen in Ottawa, along with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN]. I urge all other Members of this body and also all Members of the House of Representatives to visit with these distinguished members of the Canadian Parliament. I do not know how these gentlemen could have been any nicer to us than they were. If my colleagues want to encounter real hospitality and real friendship, I suggest that they visit Canada and these gentlemen.

I say to our distinguished guests that we in the United States need their cooperation and support, and we appreciate their cooperation and support. I hope we can have many meetings similar to the ones Senator AIKEN and I enjoyed with them in Ottawa; and I hope that they and all other members of their Parliament will visit us here.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, understanding and friendship are a two-way street. Out of friendship comes understanding, and out of understanding comes friendship; and of course, that process makes our relationships so pleasant and makes understanding so very easy.

Our course, our two countries have the common experience of Anglo-Saxon background and a common language; and out of that has come, over a long period of time, the felicity which makes you call us your neighbor, and makes us call you our neighbor.

I am glad you are here; and I believe that from parliamentary meetings such as this one and the one I enjoyed attending in Europe so recently, there comes better understanding which advances the whole cause of progress. So I am delighted to see you here.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the distinguished Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I wish to say to our distinguished guests and friends that I am their neighbor; I live in North Dakota. I have had many delightful experiences in meeting citizens of Canada who have visited North Dakota.

Of course, I, in turn, like to visit Canada, both to enjoy my experiences there and meetings with its fine citizens and to enjoy the fishing. In addition, we have the benefit of the great Peace Garden.

I want to compliment our distinguished visitors for the fine way their Government treated the farmers of Canada after World War I. Within a year Canada canceled every seed and feed loan. But in North Dakota alone there were 34,000 farmers; and today our Government still is charging 4,000 of them 6 percent interest a year, and the result is that the interest amounts to a great deal more than the principal.

So when we meet in the Peace Garden and when our farmers join your farmers in celebrating, our farmers are very much distressed to find that they have not received from their Government the fine treatment that your Government has given to the farmers of Canada.

I join my colleagues in bidding you welcome. It is most delightful and indeed a very great pleasure to see you here.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield to my distinguished friend, the Senator from Oregon, who is a member of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to say to our Canadian friends that I have the privilege of serving under the leadership of Senator AIKEN, who is chairman of our so-called Canadian Subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee, of which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] is also a member; and then I have the privilege of having them serve with me in my capacity as chairman of the Subcommittee on Latin-American Affairs.

The message I would leave with our distinguished Canadian brothers is that in my opinion we have a comity of interest and obligations in respect to Latin America. I have said at meetings of the Foreign Relations Committee, and I wish to say now to our distinguished guests, that in my judgment Canada and the United States should proceed as brothers in the attempt to solve the relationships with Latin America, to the end that they may be improved and that there will be a better understanding throughout Latin America in regard to her two northern neighbors.

My conversations with members of the Canadian Parliament in the past lead me to believe that you gentlemen share that point of view. Therefore, in my capacity as a member of Senator AIKEN's subcommittee and as chairman of the Latin-American Subcommittee, I invite you to join with us in a partnership arrangement, to the end that we may strengthen the policies toward Latin America on the part of both Canada and the United States.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to my friend, the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I, too, would like to join my distinguished colleagues in a word of welcome to our dear friends, these distinguished members of the Parliament of Canada. I represent in part the State of New York, a State with which they have many important relationships, both in the economic field, in social terms, and in governmental matters. I hazard the guess that they visit my State perhaps more than any other State in our Nation.

Of course Canadians are always very welcome in New York, as they know. We count them as brothers, and we mean that very literally. Furthermore, the State of New York prides itself on its economic relations with Canada. Canada joins us in connection with the St. Lawrence Seaway and in connection with the use of the waters of the Niagara River and its tremendous power development and the great community of interest that exists between us.

I think I speak advisedly when I say that today our new Governor, Nelson Rockefeller, has very close to his heart the entire matter of United States-Canadian relations, particularly in terms of the interests of our own State; and as these gentlemen have experienced with our Governors prior to Governor Rockefeller, I believe they will find a welcome hand, a warm understanding, and a spirit of great cooperation added to a spirit of new enterprise in terms of the government of the State of New York. I know I certainly bespeak the views of my colleague from New York, who does not happen to be on the floor at the moment.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to my friend from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I wish to join my colleagues in welcoming our neighbors from across the border, members of the Parliament of Canada.

Because I represent, in part, the State which has perhaps the closest contact with the most Canadian provinces, since Montana borders on British Columbia, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, and because I know something about the many problems which sometimes cause us trouble and difficulty, but never divide us, I am delighted that these members of the Canadian Parliament are here to visit with us, to discuss these difficulties, and to arrive at common understandings.

I wish to commend the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] for taking the initiative in the establishment of this interparliamentary group, so to speak, and I wish to point out that he got the idea from Premier Diefenbaker, who, while visiting Trinity College, in Connecticut, made a speech to the effect that a liaison group of this kind would be in the best possible interest of both countries.

So I am delighted that these gentlemen are here. I hope this meeting is only the beginning of many similar meetings in the future; and I know that from them will come a better understanding, a better feeling, and an accentuation of the good will which has marked the relationships between our two countries, not only since both of our countries became independent, but even before then.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to my friend, the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I wish to join my colleagues today in extending the warm hand of friendship and welcome to these distinguished members of the Parliament of Canada.

It is my privilege to represent, in part, in this body the great State of Minnesota. Of course, Minnesota joins territorially and geographically the great country of Canada; and our relationships are cordial, friendly, and, indeed, helpful to both areas.

Likewise, we are at the end of the great St. Lawrence Seaway. So that our relationships in the area of commerce with Canada are closer than ever. Many people from Minneapolis and St. Paul travel to Winnipeg, Canada, and many persons from Winnipeg come to the Twin Cities.

When I was mayor of Minneapolis, I visited Winnipeg, and the mayor of Winnipeg came to our area. Those relationships are very happy memories. But I believe now, as has been suggested today, we would do well to talk of the future, and resolve to solve our problems as good friends do, respecting the rights of each other, and making such accommodations as will provide for unity through understanding and mutual respect.

I join with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], and wish to commend him upon his worthy endeavors and leadership in establishing, on our part, this very fine example of cooperation between two great countries. I am looking forward to the coming days when we can be together again.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I think probably I am one of the very few Members of the U.S. Senate who found it convenient and desirable to go home last August by way of Canada. I live in South Dakota, but I went to New England, and, from Lake Champlain, went to Canada. I visited Ottawa, and saw the Government House, and some of the very fine and outstanding buildings there. In fact, it was my thought at the time that Ottawa was splendidly equipped to be the scene of international conferences and international groups, as it has been in the past. I am sure it will be in the future.

From there I went north, to Algonquin Provincial Park. I may say to my colleague from North Dakota that I saw a shorthorn cow which I thought was the largest cow I had ever seen. [Laughter.]

I have a picture of it. I am exhibiting it to my friends in South Dakota and saying, "Take a look at that, and do your best." We spent a few days at Huntsville, in the beautiful lake country of that area. It is magnificent. I was proud that it was a part of a country that is our friend, Canada.

You are most welcome here. I hope some of you will visit us in South Dakota.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, as one of the representatives in the Senate from the State of Texas and as a member of the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, I want to join in these words of welcome to our friends, the members of the Canadian Parliament with us in the Senate today. The Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee has no jurisdiction over legislation dealing with foreign relations but does have jurisdiction over laws relating to foreign commerce.

In the last session we had the privilege of passing two bills which furthered commerce between Canada and the United States. One of those bills extended the time during which a Canadian-owned steamship line may serve the 49th State by furnishing service between Alaska and the other 48 States. I think it is an anomaly that the only regular steamship service between Alaska and the other 48 States is furnished by a Canadian steamship line.

Many citizens from my State have been to Alaska. The only way they can get to Alaska overland is by going through Canada over the Alcan Highway. The only transportation ties between our old 48 States and the new 49th State by land or water have been by Canadian aid, either through using Canadian steamship service, or overland, across Canada itself. Such transportation bridge between our newest State, Alaska, and the older 48 States across the Dominion of Canada, serve to strengthen the ties of commerce and bonds of friendship that link our two nations and peoples.

In the last session of the Congress there also was passed a bill which permitted foreign-owned vessels—British and Canadian owned barges primarily—to use the inland waterways of the United States. Such laws deal with commerce, and not with treaties. They deal with people-to-people relations, further promoting the commercial relations of our two nations.

There is another phase of this subject in which our people are directly interested, and that is gas and oil lines from the great reserves in Canada to markets in the United States. More gas and oil pipelines have been projected.

Our friends will recall that during the dark days of World War II our war effort was crippled by the fact that so many ships were sunk by German submarines. The enemy at that time had only about one-eighth the number of submarines now possessed by countries behind the Iron Curtain.

In the event another such tragedy should befall us, the oil and gas pipelines which link these energy reserves with the industrial centers of our two nations would provide the means of furnishing fuel and energy to both of our countries.

to help us survive in any assault which might possibly be made against us.

We want our Canadian friends to know we are appreciative of their cooperation. You have permitted the building of the DEW line, the radar observation chain, in your northern territories, so that the first warning of attack on the United States or Canada will come from your territory. We are grateful to you for the great friendship and cooperation of your people in these endeavors.

I am glad to help welcome you to the floor of the U.S. Senate.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. COTTON. As a representative of the State of New Hampshire, and on behalf of Senator BRIDGES and myself, I want to express my sincere sympathy to you for having had to listen to all these long speeches, and to join in bidding you welcome.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. As the senior Senator from the State of Ohio, which is in physical contact with Canada except for Lake Erie, I wish to extend a welcome to you in your visit to the United States. I believe I speak the will of the people of Ohio when I say to you we have recognized the mutual interdependence which exists between Canada and the United States.

I feel positive that the people of Ohio recognize that the things which hurt Canada will eventually hurt Ohio. We believe that as Canada grows stronger, the United States will grow stronger. We believe that if we grow weak, Canada will inevitably grow weak. We are neighbors standing shoulder to shoulder, lifted and dropped by every good thing or every bad thing that affects us.

As a Member of the Senate, I should like to say to you that in my approach to my responsibilities with respect to Canada, I will constantly have in mind that anything imprudent which I did, prejudicially affecting your Dominion, inevitably will affect my Nation. I think I speak the thinking and the will of the citizens of Ohio when I deliver that message to you.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILEY. My friends from Canada, as a representative of a State bordering on Lake Superior, a large part of which provides the southern line of Canada, and speaking also on behalf of the Senator who now occupies the Chair, the junior Senator from the State of Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], I bid you welcome. It is good to see some old acquaintances in this delegation, friends I made in connection with meetings of those interested in the St. Lawrence development. One I knew when attending sessions of the United Nations..

Canada has been of interest to me from the days when I was a boy and read the story of Evangeline. As I grew into manhood, I visited the cities of Quebec and Montreal. I traveled through the lake country and across the continent on the Canadian Pacific, up to Lake Louise and Banff, and on to the west coast. It seemed to me that God Almighty had created this continent to be one geographically, to be one in its political approaches, although our Governments were separate as nations, one in the religious approach of our people, and one in the economic approach to domestic and world problems.

I think it is a wonderful thing, gentlemen, that this exchange of members of parliamentary bodies has gotten underway to such a point that groups such as yours, who really are the ambassadors of good thinking and good living, visit their neighbors. It makes for the constructive building up of relationships in every direction. We welcome you, and may you begin today to have the time of your lives in the good old U.S.A.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. I thank the Senator from Texas.

Mr. President, since I come from one of the States of the far South, South Carolina, I take this opportunity to extend the glad hand of welcome to these distinguished gentleman from the far North, from the great Republic of Canada.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I may say to you gentleman from Canada that I come from Massachusetts. I was in Ottawa when the idea was first fostered of the exchange of greetings between members of the Parliament of Canada and ourselves. As a Massachusetts Senator, knowing that many good Canadians are in Massachusetts and that they generally vote Republican, I am very glad to see you here.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I wish to thank the majority leader, the Senator from Texas, for yielding the time for the paying of tributes by the Members of our body to our Canadian friends who are visiting us today. I think this is a great day for the United States and for Canada. As I stated earlier, our friends will be in the Vice President's room for a short time, where they will be glad to meet any Members of the Senate. I hope all those who have not spoken, at least, as well as all those who have spoken, will meet our friends personally.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 5) proposing to amend Senate rules XXII and XXXIII.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, if no other Senator wishes to address the Senate, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, may I ask who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THURMOND in the chair). The Senator from Texas has the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. DOUGLAS. May I address the Senate? Has the Senator from Texas yielded?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I suggested the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, a few minutes ago the Senator from Texas offered a unanimous consent agreement that we proceed to vote on various amendments on next Monday. I am sure he does not wish to carry over the implication, which was unfortunately present in his original statement, that those of us who are trying to curb filibusters are themselves indulging in a filibuster. That, of course, is not the case, and I am sure the Senator from Texas will wish to correct the RECORD so far as his remarks on that point are concerned.

I have consulted on this subject with my colleagues, and we are very glad to accept the main features of the proposal of the Senator from Texas, that we proceed to vote on Monday, or on such other day as may immediately follow, on both the amendments and the resolution itself.

We suggest two changes. We suggest, first, that on the motion which will probably be the initial motion, namely, the one proposing an ultimate limitation of debate by majority vote, debate be limited to 3 hours, to be equally divided; and that debate on other amendments be limited to 2 hours. We are willing to provide that the agreement apply only to amendments which are at the desk at the conclusion of the session today, and that the debate on the final adoption of the resolution be limited to 4 hours.

I believe this is a very clear indication of good faith on the part of those of us who wish to curb filibusters. I hope the Senator from Texas will be willing to accept it on behalf of the advocates of the filibuster.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I believe we shall have to reserve judgment on the classifications which are sought to be applied to various amendments. I am interested in entering into an agreement with respect to debate on proposals to amend rule XXII. If the Senator cares to call up his amendment now, he can speak on it as long as he desires to speak on it today, and as long as he desires to speak on it tomorrow. It would be the pending amendment on Monday. On Monday the debate on the amendment would be limited to 2 hours. That would mean not only 2 hours of debate on Monday, but the Senator could speak also for the remainder of today and all of tomorrow, if he desires to speak tomorrow. If he does not, we need not have a session tomorrow.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Do I understand that the Senator from Texas does not wish to accord 4 hours of debate to the so-called majority rule amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from Texas does not wish to waste Friday. He is not a Monday, Wednesday, and Friday man. He is a 6-day man.

Mr. DOUGLAS. So is the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from Illinois would have all day tomorrow to discuss the amendment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The proposal is merely a proposal for a vote. It is not, as I understood the Senator from Texas, a proposal to shut off any discussion today or tomorrow. We could still have discussion of it today and tomorrow, as the Senator from Texas has originally proposed.

It is merely that, in accordance with the proposal of the Senator from Texas, we are ready to proceed to vote on Monday, after preliminary discussion today and tomorrow, and I am willing to provide for 2 hours of debate on each amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If the Senator wishes more than 2 hours on his amendment, he could now make his amendment the pending business and then could address himself to it for the remainder of the day, and speak into the evening. If he cared to do so, he could also speak on it tomorrow, Saturday. I believe we will have to be clear about that. So far as I am concerned, we could have a session tomorrow, if any Senator wanted to discuss the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I had hoped that the Senator from Texas would be willing to have discussed at somewhat greater length than other amendments an amendment which seeks to effect the pledge made by the Democratic Party in the 1952 and 1956 platforms. But if he is unwilling to do that, then, in order to get an agreement with the Senator from Texas, I shall be perfectly willing to accept the provision for 2 hours on each amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is what I proposed. I think that is agreeable.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would suggest, however, that on final passage 4 hours of debate be provided.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think that would be reasonable. I shall be glad to suggest 4 hours. I modify my proposal accordingly.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Would the Senator from Texas clarify the proposal and state whether the definition of an amendment applies to all amendments when offered or to amendments at the desk at a specific time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from Illinois was walking toward the wall. I did not hear him.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from Illinois was speaking in a low voice.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I sometimes have difficulty hearing the Senator from Texas in the Chamber.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am aware of that. I sometimes have difficulty hearing—period.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator from Texas for his characteristic courtesy.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator from Illinois for reciprocating that courtesy in his characteristic fashion.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator from Texas. Now, if I may start again——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator may start.

Mr. DOUGLAS. What does the Senator from Texas believe should be the procedure concerning amendments? Should the debate on amendments be limited to amendments which are at the desk at the conclusion of the session today, or should it include any amendments which may be offered at the time? So far as I am concerned——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the Senator let me answer his question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. May I finish?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If the Senator from Illinois is asking a question——

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wanted to indicate my position.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I understand.

Mr. DOUGLAS. We shall be very glad to limit the amendments to those which are at the desk at the conclusion of the business of the Senate today.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I suggested to the Senator in writing, before he made his last statement, the form of proposal which would be agreeable to me. I told him earlier that I wanted to have as many Senators as possible present. I had a quorum called for that purpose.

I do not know of any other amendments to be offered, but I would not want any Senator to come in and say that he could not offer an amendment.

The proposed unanimous-consent agreement is in writing before the Senator. I have modified it in only one respect, namely, by changing the 2 hours on final passage to 4 hours.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I may say that the proposal is acceptable to us.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I shall be glad to yield to my colleague from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The Anderson amendment, in the first place, was amended by the Clark amendment. What about amendments to the amendments which will be pending as of the conclusion of business today?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I suppose that would depend on the judgment of the Parliamentarian and the Presiding Officer.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The situation should not be left in that condition. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, we should have pretty fair knowledge of what the proceeding is to be.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment for myself and on behalf of Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. JAVITS, Mr. CASE of New Jersey, Mr. MORSE, Mr. KUCHEL, Mr. HENNINGS, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. CLARK, Mr. KEATING, Mr. MCNAMARA, Mr. NEUBERGER, Mr. HART, and Mr. MCCARTHY. It is the so-called ultimate majority amendment, the constitutional majority amendment. I have offered it so that it may become the pending question and be discussed at such length today as the Senator from Texas may desire. If he wishes to have it discussed on Saturday, it would be the pending question, and it would be the first order of business on Monday.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire will state it.

Mr. BRIDGES. Has action been taken on the unanimous-consent request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from New Hampshire please restate his question?

Mr. BRIDGES. The Senator from New Hampshire has just entered the Chamber. He is inquiring, first, whether a unanimous-consent request has been made for a vote; and, second, if such a request has been made, if action has been taken on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Such a request has been made, but no action has been taken thereon.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I send the amendment to the desk and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. Beginning with line 7, page 1, it is proposed to strike out all of section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. Subsection 3 of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended to read as follows:

"3. If at any time, notwithstanding the provisions of rule III or rule VI or any other rule of the Senate, a motion, signed by 16 Senators, to bring to a close the debate upon any measure, motion, or other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, is presented to the Senate pursuant to this subsection, the Presiding Officer shall at once state the motion to the Senate, and 1 hour after the Senate meets on the 15th calendar day thereafter (exclusive of Sundays and legal holidays), he shall lay the motion before the Senate and direct that the Secretary call the roll, and, upon the ascertainment that a quorum is present, the Presiding Officer shall, without further debate, submit to the Senate by a yea-and-nay vote the question:

"'Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate shall be brought to a close?'

"And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by a majority vote of the Senators duly chosen and sworn, then said measure, motion, or other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, shall be the unfinished business to the exclusion of all other business until disposed of.

"Thereafter no Senator shall be entitled to speak in all more than 1 hour on the measure, motion, or other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, the amendments thereto, and motions affecting the same, and it shall be the duty of the Presiding Officer to keep the time of each Senator who speaks. Except by unanimous consent, no amendment shall be in order after the vote to bring the debate to a close, unless the same has been presented and read prior to that time. No dilatory motion, or dilatory amendment, or amendment not germane shall be in order. Points of order, including questions of relevancy, and appeals from the decision of the Presiding Officer, shall be decided without debate."

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not want to debate the amendment at this time, although we are ready to continue the discussion this afternoon and tomorrow. I simply wish to say that the amendment has now become, I believe, the pending question. We have agreed, on our side, to a 2-hour limitation of debate. We hope the debate will proceed and that we may have a vote on Monday on this amendment and on any other amendment which may be offered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will my colleague yield for an inquiry?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Under the rule, obviously any amendment to an amendment lying at the desk would also be entitled to 2 hours under the unanimous consent request. I think that point should be made clear.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, on behalf of the distinguished minority leader and myself, I submit a proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The agreement will be read:

The legislative clerk read, as follows:

Ordered, That, effective on Monday, January 12, 1959, at the conclusion of routine morning business, during the further consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 5) to amend rules XXII and and XXXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, debate on any amendment, or amendments to amendments, motion, or appeal, except a motion to lay on the table, shall be limited to 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the mover of any such amendment or motion and the majority leader: Provided, That in the event the majority leader is in favor of any such amendment or motion, the time in opposition thereto shall be controlled by the minority leader or some Senator designated by him: Provided further, That no amendment that is not germane to the provisions of the said resolution shall be received.

Ordered further, That on the question of the final passage of the said resolution debate shall be limited to 4 hours, to be equally divided and controlled, respectively, by the majority and minority leaders: Provided, That the said leaders or either of them, may, from the time under their control on the passage of said resolution, yield additional time to any Senator during the consideration of any amendment, motion, or appeal.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois will state it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the agreement take effect immediately, or is it to apply on Monday?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think the agreement states that it is to take effect at the conclusion of morning business on Monday. It is the intention to enter an order, if it be agreed to, to have the Senate convene at 10 o'clock on Monday morning. The agreement, as I understand, provides that it shall become effective at the conclusion of morning business on Monday. That could be 9, 10, 11, or 12 o'clock, depending on when the Senate convenes on Monday. It will take effect at the conclusion of morning business on Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THURMOND in the chair). That is what the proposal provides.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask a question of the distinguished majority leader. I notice that a provision in regard to amendments to the amendment is included in the proposed agreement. Are we to understand that in the case of any amendment which would be sent to the desk and would be on the desk this evening, the entire amount of time proposed to be allowed could be consumed in speaking on such an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The proposed agreement will not go into effect until next Monday.

Mr. ELLENDER. I understand.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from Louisiana said "this evening."

Mr. ELLENDER. But I should like to ask this question: Suppose the pending amendment is before the Senate, as it will be, when the Senate begins to vote on Monday. Suppose several amendments are proposed to the pending amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Two hours will be available on each one, as the Chair has just ruled.

Mr. ELLENDER. Then, as I understand, it will be possible——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That has always been the case; the time on any amendment to an amendment is the same as the time on the amendment itself. Is that correct, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. ELLENDER. So, if 40 amendments are proposed to the amendment, it will be possible for the proponents of those 40 amendments to the amendment to have 80 hours——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. But I do not wish to think in such terms.

Mr. ELLENDER. But it would be possible, would it not?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes, it would be possible. The time available on every amendment to an amendment will be the same time as the time available on the amendment itself. The Presiding Officer has already ruled that the time available on an amendment to the amendment will be 2 hours, the same as the time available on the amendment itself.

Mr. President——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I believe I have the floor. I yield further to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, today the Senator from New Mexico modified his amendment. But if his modified amendment had been considered as an amendment to the amendment, he would have been allowed an additional 2 hours, if the agreement now proposed had been in effect.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Texas has finished, and only if he has finished, let me remove the fears of the Senator from Louisiana by saying that we have no intention to pile up amendments to the amendment, and there will be no filibuster.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am sure of that.

Mr. ELLENDER. I think a distinction should be made in the case of amendments to the amendment—perhaps by providing a limit of 15 minutes to a side, in the case of amendments to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. But the Chair's ruling was that the time available on amendments to an amendment would be the same as the time available on the amendment itself. Does the Senator from Louisiana favor the provision of less time in the case of amendments to the amendment?

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes; in the case of amendments to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. But the Chair ruled that the time available on amendments to the amendment would be the same as the time available on the amendment itself; and we wished to be sure of that.

Of course we shall yield back any time that is not needed.

Mr. MORTON and Mr. CASE of South Dakota addressed the Chair.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I shall be glad to yield; and I yield now to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. MORTON. I thank the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. President, as I understand the request of the majority leader, there would be no requirement that an amendment be on the desk tonight.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, let me say that is correct.

Mr. MORTON. Let me ask the Chair to ascertain whether an amendment which I submitted on yesterday—and the amendment has been printed, and is numbered 1–8–59–B—is at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is at the desk.

Mr. MORTON. I thank the Chair.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield to the Senator from South Dakota, if I may do so with the understanding that thereby I shall not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I do not care to object or to reserve the right to object to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement until a parliamentary inquiry I have in mind is answered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, on yesterday I gave notice of an intention to submit an amendment which would be in order if the Johnson resolution were to be considered today. But under the proposed unanimous-consent agreement, as I have heard it read, I understand that amendments would be limited to those which would be germane. The amendment I propose deals with one of the rules, but with a rule other than those dealt with by the Johnson resolution. Would I be foreclosed from offering the amendment, on which I have given notice, in view of the fact that the amendment deals with rule XIX, rather than with rules XXII or XXXII?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the opinion of the Chair that such an amendment would not be in order under the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Then, Mr. President, I would have to object to the proposed agreement. I do not think the majority leader would want to foreclose me from an opportunity to submit the amendment. It is one which under the rules of the Senate would be in order, because I carefully gave notice of it on yesterday.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, did I correctly understand the ruling of the Chair to be that the amendment to which the Senator from South Dakota has referred would not be germane—not as germane, for instance, as the Douglas amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; under the unanimous-consent agreement as proposed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Then I would have no objection to excepting the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota from the provision in the unanimous-consent request requiring an amendment to be germane, and I so modify my request.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I thank the Senator from Texas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request, as modified?

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to inquire whether consideration could be given—because of the proposed absence of one or two Members of the Senate—to postponing this matter until Tuesday, rather than Monday. I refer to the actual vote, not to the beginning of the time limitation; I refer only to the time for the beginning of the vote.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Let me say to my good friend, the Senator from New Hampshire, that we had hoped to proceed on Monday, because we are not anxious to delay matters by even a single minute. But if the Senator from New Hampshire and his colleagues find it impossible to be in the Senate on Monday, even though his request, if granted, would mean a delay of the decision, we, in the interest of friendship and of comity, would be willing, I am sure, to postpone the debate to Tuesday. But let the record be abundantly clear that this proposal does not come from those who are supporting the move to curb the filibuster.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield further to me?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; if I may do so without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. BRIDGES. I do not wish to delay even 1 minute. So let us proceed to vote tonight. In other words, I take the Senator from Illinois at his word. If he says he is ready to vote now, then I should like to have the Senate vote tonight.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Oh, no; I said that I will be ready to vote on Monday.

Mr. BRIDGES. But I do not want the Senator from Illinois to delay even the extra minute to which he referred.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Or I shall be ready to vote on Tuesday.

Mr. President, it is very interesting to find the Senator from New Hampshire pleading that he has other engagements so important that on Monday he cannot come to the Senate to discuss what probably is the most important matter that will be before the Senate this year. I know the high sense of duty which animates the Senator from New Hampshire; and I am sure that, on mature reflection, he will be here on Monday, or, if that is physically impossible, that he will be here on Tuesday; and so we shall waive our desire, and the desire the majority leader expressed, in favor of dealing with this matter on Tuesday. We are willing to make a great many concessions to the Senator from New Hampshire, and I hope he will show a due sense of reciprocal trade.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Illinois yield, so that I may ask a question of the distinguished majority leader, provided it is understood that the Senator from Illinois will not thereby lose his right to the floor?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will yield for that purpose, with the understanding that I shall not thereby lose my right to the floor.

Mr. LANGER. As I understand the unanimous-consent request, it will, if agreed to, result in a vote finally, on Monday, on the Johnson resolution?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No; I do not know when we shall ever get to the Johnson resolution, because there will be offered many amendments to the Johnson resolution. We cannot vote on the resolution until we have disposed of the amendments.

I hope that once we get a unanimous-consent agreement, it will be with the understanding that the Senate will convene at 10 o'clock on Monday. I hope to get a vote on all the amendments, and on the resolution itself, as early as possible, and that could be Monday. I am not informed as to how many amendments will be offered at the desk, but I would hope the vote may come on Monday.

Mr. LANGER. I thank the Senator; but the unanimous-consent request does include the Johnson resolution?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes; and all amendments to it.

I thank the Senator from Illinois for yielding.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I desire again to make it clear that we desire to accommodate the majority leader, and we desire to accommodate the distinguished chairman of the Republican policy committee, and we shall agree to vote on either Monday or Tuesday, whichever date is most satisfactory to them.

I see no further purpose in holding the floor, and I am prepared to yield, but first I should like to make one parliamentary inquiry, if I may be permitted to make it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is the amendment which I sent to the desk the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the pending question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. So that no Senator may be misled, I think I should say there are several Senators who do not desire to vote tonight. I do not think their motives should be questioned. I am one who is prepared to vote without a minute's delay. When I say that, I mean it. There are some Senators who do not want to vote tomorrow, because they have made other plans, and some of them are supporting the proposal of the Senator from Illinois, and the Senate should know that.

Because of those circumstances, I suggested, in an attempt to accommodate some of the proponents of the amendment, that the Senate also go over Sunday, so that they would have that additional day for any propaganda efforts, since propaganda is very heavy in the corridors of the Capitol now, in connection with this issue, and we want to give everybody adequate opportunity to do as much educational work as he may desire to do.

I am told that there are a few Senators on the minority side who are not going to be here Monday. I had hoped that Senators who had wanted to vote without a minute's delay would give pairs. I would gladly pair with any Senator if he did not have the same view I entertain. Last year I agreed with Senator Knowland that any time he had to be away from the Senate I would give him a live pair. He did the same for me. He did pair with me on votes when I had to be away.

I hope the proponents of amendments, on one side or the other, will try to accommodate at least two members of the minority who desire to oppose the amendments to the Johnson resolution and who support the resolution since they are sponsors. If there are any accommodating souls on either side of the aisle who happen to be proponents of the pending amendment and are willing to enter into an agreement to pair, then I think we could solve all our difficulties by arranging two pairs. We could then convene at 10 o'clock on Monday morning, and vote on Monday.

I regret very much we have gotten away from the practice of pairing in the Senate. I am told that many years ago Senator Robinson and Senator McNary had live pairs on all matters, and that other Senators followed the same practice. It was a great accommodation, and it really expedited the business of the Senate. I should like to see a return to that practice in the Senate, because Senators would be surprised to learn how many times we have to hold up votes because certain Senators cannot be here Friday or Saturday. Then, when they are away on Friday or Saturday, attending to other business, they do not want to come back on Monday.

Many times in the Senate I have found it impossible to transact business, so far as voting is concerned, except on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday. I am not a Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursay man, myself. I have to be here 7 days a week. On occasions when I leave I get a pair, if I can do so. I do not hold up any votes.

I remember one time I anticipated what was going to happen in connection with the road bill. I thought we would not have any important action taken. I consulted the leadership. I became inspired and said, "Now is the time to go to Mayo's." After I got up there I called up and asked what had happened in the Senate that day. I was told, "We had seven votes today."

I wonder if the Senator from Illinois, or anyone else, knows of any proponent of this amendment or any other amendment who will agree to give Senator BRIDGES a pair.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The minority leader will be happy to give a pair at any time, but, unfortunately, he cannot have a pair with anybody who has an identical view.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Is there anyone among the proponents who will give a pair?

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I wish to say, frankly, that I have tried to accommodate Senators when they have wanted to be accommodated. However, I consider a rollcall, where possibly one vote may provide sufficient strength to assure defeat or victory, of great importance. It would be extremely embarrassing if, as a result of a live pair, that took place. Under those circumstances, I feel I should not accommodate one of my colleagues who may be required to be elsewhere on Monday. Under those circumstances, I hope we may be able to continue with a vote on these several proposed amendments until Tuesday.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am extremely anxious to have these votes promptly. I probably have as much interest in voting on some of these matters as has any other Senator. I do not know if I shall be on the opposite side from the Senator from New Hampshire at all times, but if I am, I shall be glad to pair with him, in order to have this unanimous-consent proposal agreed to. I hope it may be agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator from New Mexico. I appreciate his cooperation. I hope that will be satisfactory to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. I would also like to have a pair. I am scheduled to be out of town. I thought we were going to have a vote on Saturday. It would be inconvenient—not to me, but to others—to change my plans.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think we can arrange a pair for the Senator on the amendment in question. I hope the unanimous-consent request will be agreed to. We have worked long and hard. If it is agreed to, we hope we shall have no votes until Monday. I would like the Chair to put the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request? The Chair hears none, and it is entered.

ORDER TO CONVENE AT 10 O'CLOCK A. M. ON MONDAY NEXT

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate convenes on Monday, it convene at 10 o'clock a.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL and Mr. DOUGLAS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I wish to make a few observations with respect to the proposed amendment.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Presiding Officer suspend the session of the Senate until there is order and until the speaker can be heard?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. Attachés will please remain quiet or leave the Chamber. Senators will take their seats.

The Senator from Georgia may proceed.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, this is the first opportunity I have had to read this famous amendment about which I have read so much in the press. I have seen various analyses which were submitted by the distinguished Senator from Illinois and by other authors of the amendment, in which they protested that under the amendment the debate could last 4 or 5 weeks—that Senators would be given an opportunity to speak 4 or 5 weeks under the amendment.

While I was not satisfied with the 4 or 5 weeks, since I have seen Senators speak on important legislation for 8 or 10 weeks without anyone ever attributing a filibuster to anybody, I did think that would give the Senate some chance to debate. I wondered how it would be done.

I have now read the proposed amendment. I want to say, Mr. President, that if there has ever been a gag rule with a vengeance which was submitted to the Senate of the United States it is embraced in this proposed amendment. Give any good parliamentarian a majority of one vote in the Senate and under the proposed amendment he could forever prevent a minority in the Senate from opening its mouth to speak until after a cloture rule had been voted upon them.

We talk about giving Senators a right to speak. Why, there has never been as complete a gag submitted to the Senate of the United States as this. It would enable a mere majority to meet and recess from day to day for 15 days, then gag the Senate with a cloture rule, and cram it down Senators' throats. If this happened, the people of this country would never know what was involved in the proposed legislation.

Mr. President, there have been times in this country when the predatory interests of this land could have used such an amendment to take away what was left to the people of the United States. Under such a rule there would be times when pressure groups in this country could, by using a mere majority of the Senate, pass legislation without the minority ever having a chance to speak until after cloture had already been invoked. It would not be necessary for the Senate to meet each day. It only would be necessary to meet every third day, then move that the Senate take a recess, and meet and recess again until the gag could be imposed.

We talk about 1 hour being a long time to speak. Why, Mr. President, in the days of the great liberals—and I mean the real liberals in the real liberal tradition—men like Norris, La Follette, and Borah—Senators spoke from 4 to 5 hours at a time to alert the people of this country to the dangers which were inherent in certain legislative proposals which were before the Senate.

Under this proposition, Mr. President, the minority of the Senate would have no opportunity at all, if it were faced with a ruthless majority.

I am amazed to hear Senators talk about 5 or 6 weeks of debate being possible if this amendment were approved when, under this proposal, the Senate could be absolutely and completely gagged by a simple majority.

Mr. President, it is well enough to talk about civil rights—an important issue in this country and a popular one—and to use it as an instrument for changing the rules of the Senate. But it so happens that when the last civil rights bill was pending before the Senate, those of us who opposed the bill could not have conducted a filibuster under the existing rules to have saved our lives, and nobody knows it better than those who are pressing this proposed change in rule XXII. We could not have stopped the bill by filibuster. We could have been gagged by cloture just as soon as the formalities had been complied with. If that had not been the case the bill would not have passed. We simply did not have the votes to sustain a filibuster.

If, in the name of some imaginary civil rights necessity, the Senate passes such a rule as is now proposed, I want the prediction to be recorded now, Mr. President, that it will be utilized for other legislation and in other ways that will be detrimental to the country long before a cloture rule will ever be invoked on any new civil-rights bill.

I could not refrain, Mr. President, from making these comments after reading the proposed amendment. I have never seen a proposal which could be utilized more completely as an instrument to completely gag the Senate of the United States than this proposed amendment to the rule.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President——

Mr. RUSSELL. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I have heard with a great deal of interest, and I think with understanding, the point so ably made by my distinguished colleague from Georgia. It occurs to me, however, that the point might easily be extended to cover considerably more territory.

Is it not true that in the event of the pendency, ready for consideration, of a conference report on a very controversial bill, notice could be filed, and the conference report could be called up as a matter which was entitled to privileged consideration, and the time of the Senate could be occupied for the next 15 days as much as the majority of the Senate might decide, even including all of the time?

Mr. RUSSELL. Of course that is the case. Not only that, Mr. President, but under the proposal, the right to offer amendments, which is so vital to the Senate, could be made absolutely meaningless.

What is it that makes the Senate a great deliberative body? It is not the fact that there are only 98 Members in the Senate, from the population of 170 million. It is the fact that Senators heretofore have been permitted to "speak their piece," and to explain their views to the country. The Senate is a great deliberative body because of the fact that we have had an unbridled amendment opportunity in the Senate, not even encumbered with the rule of relevancy. There has been an unlimited right to offer amendments.

Under this proposal, the right of amendment would be precluded, as would the right of freedom of debate. It would give a temporary majority in the Senate greater power than ever has been conferred.

We talk about the Senate being a great deliberative body, but adoption of this proposal would mean that henceforth and forevermore it would be only another legislative body.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is the proposed rule not also susceptible of misuse and abuse in still another way? Let us assume that some treaties were on the Executive Calendar ready for consideration, or that some nominations were ready for consideration. I remember full well, in the period since I have been a Member of the Senate, which has not been very long, that the debate regarding the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Lilienthal consumed a good many days of debate on the floor of the Senate. Matters of that kind, constituting executive business, might be so used during the allotted 15 days as to consume entirely the time of the Senate and to preclude a full discussion of the issue, much less a discussion of amendments, to which the Senator has already referred.

Mr. RUSSELL. It could be used in a great many ways. If the Presiding Officer happened to be with the majority of one he could recognize only Members of the majority to speak, thus presenting only one side of the question, a highly distorted side, and permeating the airways and the press of the country with the views of the majority alone. The minority would never have an opportunity to speak in an effort to protest passage of the proposed legislation, except during the 1 hour which would be available after it had been gagged and the issue had been determined. Even that would not afford the right of offering perfecting amendments to the legislation.

Mr. HOLLAND. I think the Senator has persuaded the Senator from Florida, and that the Senator from Florida is well persuaded that he should oppose this amendment with all possible vigor. If he had not been of that opinion heretofore, he would have been persuaded by the eloquence and by the irrefutable facts which have been advanced by his distinguished friend from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. ERVIN. I should like to ask the Senator a question, and I should like to make a statement as a premise to the question.

The first time I ever heard of a filibuster I was a boy 12 years of age, and was brought into the Senate gallery by my father. A great liberal was speaking. He was a true liberal, not the kind of liberal who is so illiberal that he wants to make everyone conform to his thoughts and actions. He was one of the great liberals, who was perfectly willing that other people should have different opinions and should express them. I refer to Robert M. La Follette the elder. He was conducting a filibuster by himself, against a bill which he considered iniquitous.

If the proposal advanced by the able and distinguished Senator from Illinois were adopted by the Senate, I ask the Senator from Georgia if all the debate that could possibly ensue under the most liberal use of the proposal by a great liberal or a great conservative fighting a filibuster himself would be limited to 1 hour. The only information he would be permitted to give to the American people from the floor of the U.S. Senate would be what little he could say in an hour. Is that not true?

Mr. RUSSELL. If the majority were ruthless enough to utilize this proposal to the utmost, that would be the case. Everyone knows that after cloture is voted it is impossible to disseminate very much information.

Mr. ERVIN. If the majority elected to remain silent, 1 hour would be all the time allotted for speaking by a man who might be on the side of truth, on the side of justice, and on the side of liberty. That would be all the time he could have.

Mr. RUSSELL. Absolutely; and in many cases he would not have an opportunity even to get around the edges of the problem and expose some great delinquency or some great danger in a bill, or call attention to some way in which it could be used to exploit a vast segment of the people of the country. He would have only 1 hour in which to do it, and that would be after the die had been cast and cloture had been invoked.

Mr. ERVIN. Under the press of senatorial duties and the necessity of a man's preparing himself to make a speech even of 1 hour's duration, if he were restricted to such a time, I ask the distinguished Senator from Georgia if he would not be denied any opportunity to make preparation for the speech, which could last for only an hour, when he would be gagged.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think the adoption of such a rule as is proposed would be a major change in our form of Government.

We talk about our vaunted system of checks and balances. The veto is a check and a balance. The right to override a veto is an outstanding check and balance. But after all, the greatest of all checks, and the surest of all balances, which has kept the Ship of State on an even keel down through 170 years, has been the right of amendment and the right of free debate in the U.S. Senate. If we destroy that right, we destroy the most important check upon the arbitrary power of an Executive. That is the most salutary check on a temporary majority inflamed by passion, or, in some instances, misled by misinformation.

In this day of highly organized pressure groups we must remember that a temporary majority in the Senate does not always represent a majority of the people of the United States. In some instances it does not even represent a substantial number of the people of the United States. Yet it is proposed to give to a temporary majority the power, if it is ruthless in its approach, the power to gag their colleagues and deny them the right to be heard and the right to offer amendments to proposed legislation.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one further question?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. ERVIN. In order to ask the question, I will first lay down this premise:

I had the honor at one time to represent my district in the House of Representatives. A proposal came before the House which I considered to be of supreme importance for the preservation of the freedom of the free world. I wished to express my views on that proposal, and in order to express my views on a proposal which I believed dealt with the possibility of the existence of the free world, I had to borrow 2 minutes from the Democrats and 2 minutes from the Republicans. In that way I could get 4 minutes in that legislative body to speak on the most important question that came before that Congress.

I ask the distinguished Senator from Georgia if the adoption of a rule such as is proposed would not indicate the danger that the Senate might be reduced to the same kind of legislative body as the House, in which a Member does very well to get 4 minutes to speak on the most important question coming before the body.

Mr. RUSSELL. I sat in my seat today and heard three Members of this body use the illustration of the approach of the House of Representatives to the adoption of rules as the criterion we should follow, and the reason why we should take the action urged. I was utterly appalled.

The House of Representatives is a great body in its way, but under its rules Members are often denied the right of amendment and are unable to get any time at all to speak. God forbid that Senators should have to come as mendicants, imploring and pleading for 3 minutes to express their views on the floor of the Senate, as is the case in the House.

Mr. O'MAHONEY rose.

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I desire to be recognized for the purpose of making a statement of my own.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. First, let me say that I am very happy to have the Senator from Wyoming speak, but is it customary for one Senator to bequeath the floor to another, or must a Senator obtain recognition from the Chair?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I was standing at my desk waiting for the Chair to recognize me, and I was recognized by the Chair. When the Senator from Georgia offered to yield to me I said distinctly that I did not ask him to yield, but that I wanted the floor in my own right. I was standing waiting for recognition by the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator from Illinois was in his seat.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I am very happy to withdraw my parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I desire to make this statement, which I dictated this morning, for the purpose of sending it to some constituents in my State as well as to supply a summary of my views on this question to certain Members of the Senate who were kind enough to request them. So I ask the opportunity to read the statement now without interruption.

ISSUE IS WISDOM OF CLOTURE BY A MERE MAJORITY

The issue posed here is not majority rule.

It is not civil rights.

It is not even the general question of the constitutional power of a majority of the Senate to adopt rules or to change rules.

It is only the question whether it is wise to permit a majority of a Senate quorum to impose cloture, that is to say to stop debate of any issue whenever a majority of a Senate quorum is so disposed.

A quorum of the present Senate with 98 Members is 50. A majority of that quorum is 26.

When Thomas Jefferson said that the living generation should not be controlled by the decisions of the generations of the past, he was talking of the whole people of a Nation. He was not talking about a legislative body.

U.S. SENATE REPRESENTS THE STATES

We must remember first that the Senate was established by the men who drafted the Constitution as a body to represent the States, not as a body to represent all the people of the United States. True, the Senators are elected by the people in the several States, but no State, no matter how great its population may be, has more than 2 Senators. I heartily approve of the constitutional amendment by which the election of Senators was taken away from the legislatures and reposed in the voting populace of the several States.

The purpose of the framers of the Constitution was to make certain that in one of the two legislative bodies the States should all be equal.

A new State, Alaska, has just been admitted to the Union. Its population, as estimated by the Bureau of the Census on July 1, 1958, was 167,000. The population of the State of New York is 16,229,000, but Alaska has 2 Senators and New York has 2 Senators.

The 13 States having the smallest population, according to the Bureau of the Census, account for 7,445,000 of the 172,602,000 who inhabit the United States. These 13 States have 26 Senators, a majority of a quorum. They have the power to rule the Senate because they constitute a majority of a quorum, but obviously they represent a small minority of the whole people of the United States.

We cannot possibly, therefore, be talking about majority rule when we are talking about the imposition of cloture in the Senate of the United States.

I have heard some of my colleagues say to the newly elected Senators that they never have had an opportunity to vote upon the Senate rules. Neither have they ever had an opportunity to vote on Robert's Rules of Order.

PROTECTION OF RIGHTS OF MINORITIES IS AT STAKE

Those who ask the Senate to risk the danger of being obliged to tie itself up at the beginning of every Congress in a battle over the adoption of rules are not fighting for majority rule but they are fighting against the protection of the rights of minorities.

Thomas Jefferson had a word about this. In his first inaugural message as President of the United States he said:

> All, too, will bear in mind this sacred principle, that though the will of the majority is in all cases to prevail, that will to be rightful must be reasonable; that the minority possess their equal rights, which equal law must protect, and to violate would be oppression. Let us, then, fellow citizens, unite with one heart and one mind. Let us restore to social intercourse that harmony and affection without which liberty and even life itself are but dreary things.

EQUALITY OF STATES IS THREATENED

If we are to set a precedent now that a mere majority of a quorum of the Senate shall have the power to cut off debate, we shall be sacrificing the rights of most of the States which have less than half of the total population. We shall be sacrificing, indeed, the constitutional principle that in the Senate of the United States the States shall be equal.

It is my position that free speech is so elementary a principle of free government that we cannot afford to sacrifice it to the control of a mere majority of a quorum any more than the framers of the Constitution were willing to permit a mere majority of a quorum to expel a Member.

FREE SPEECH IN THE SENATE IS ENDANGERED

I should like to add, Mr. President, that since I dictated the statement, which I have now finished reading, I have been advised by Members of the Senate that representatives of organized labor have approached them and have threatened them if they did not vote for majority rule in the Senate. I cannot imagine how any group of laboring men could conceive the idea that they were working in their interests if they sought to support an amendment which would have the effect of putting into the hands of 26 Members of the Senate the right to give up free speech in this only forum where free speech now exists.

MINORITIES WOULD BE DEPRIVED OF REPRESENTATION

I am a liberal. I have always been a liberal. I have followed Thomas Jefferson. I have followed Woodrow Wilson. I have followed Harry Truman. I have followed Franklin Roosevelt. I have enjoyed supporting Adlai Stevenson. I have always been alined in my votes on the floor of the Senate on the side of liberalism. However, I say to my colleagues in deep sincerity that if they vote to cut off free speech in the Senate they are voting to deprive minorities of the people of the United States, whether they be farmers, whether they be laborers, whether they be small businessmen, or whatever category they may fall into, of the right to representation, and are putting them under a gag rule which is worse by far than rule XXII now on the books.

Mr. DOUGLAS obtained the floor.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield so that I may suggest the absence of a quorum, with the understanding that he does not lose the floor?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senators who wish to do so may add their names as cosponsors of my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, we are now moving into the crucial question which will decide whether we are to enact any civil rights legislation of an effective nature in this Congress, and perhaps even in this generation, or whether our efforts will be defeated by the proposed rule XXII which has been advanced by the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON].

I think it is very interesting to review the history of this proposal and the reasons why the sponsors of the amendment now before the Senate feel that it is essential for the cause of democracy and for the passage of legislation which the overwhelming majority of the public demands.

RULE IN 1917–49 FOR LIMITATION OF DEBATE BY TWO-THIRDS OF SENATORS VOTING WAS UNWORKABLE

Let us go back to the period from 1917 to 1949. During that period, the rule governing filibusters in the Senate was that they could be curbed and ultimately broken by a two-thirds vote of Senators present and voting. Under this rule, some 20 efforts were made to break a filibuster.

In only four cases did they succeed. In the remainder of the cases the requirement of a two-thirds majority of the Senators present and voting was sufficient to prevent the taking of action by the Senate. In particular, the experience with two measures was so striking that it was felt a liberalization of the cloture provisions was necessary.

In February 1946 the late and well beloved Senator Alben Barkley, of Kentucky, and other Senators sponsored a Fair Employment Practices Act; but it was subjected to a filibuster which took rather extraordinary form. Objection was made, from day to day, that the Senate Journal—not the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but the Senate Journal, which has a limited circulation, and is seen by only a few persons—did not contain a proper reference to the Deity; and day after day Senators from the South arose and protested against that indignity to divine providence—namely that the name of the Lord was not referred to in the Journal. So objection was made to the reading of the Journal. That went on day after day. At that time I happened to be in the Bethesda Naval Hospital; but I read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD each morning. My wife was then a Member of the other body; and we followed this matter with great interest. To me, at the time, the objections seemed almost sacrilegious. However, they were effective.

Finally, on February 9, Senator Barkley moved to invoke limitation of debate, or what is commonly known as cloture. He obtained 48 affirmative votes, as against 36 negative votes. So a clear majority of the Senate was in favor of limiting debate. But the 1917 requirement of a two-thirds majority of the Senators present and voting was able to prevent the application of cloture; and therefore the FEPC bill was laid aside, and did not become law, although it had been passed by the House, and although a very respectable majority of the Senate desired to have the bill passed.

Later in the same year an anti-poll-tax bill was brought up. A filibuster was conducted against that bill, also. Finally, in an effort to break the filibuster, and to give the Senate an opportunity to vote on that measure, Senator Barkley again sought to invoke cloture. He obtained 39 affirmative votes. There were 33 negative votes. Therefore, a majority of the Senators then voting were in favor of limiting debate. But since a two-thirds majority was not in favor of limiting debate, debate could not be limited; and in the face of that southern opposition, the measure was laid aside.

NINETEEN HUNDRED AND FORTY-NINE CHANGE IN RULE XXII MADE IT MORE DIFFICULT TO END A FILIBUSTER

Mr. President, as a result of all that, when the Democratic Party won a sweeping victory in the elections of 1948, the President of the United States and the leaders of the Democratic Party decided to make an effort to loosen the rule in regard to filibustering; and they introduced a measure to that effect to provide for majority rule, in order to make it easier to end a filibuster.

As I recall, that was done early in March 1949. The debate proceeded for a time. Then there happened what the Senator from New Mexico described on yesterday; namely the bipartisan alliance between the southern Senators and the conservative branch of the Republican Party once again sprang into action, and there was circulated a round robin which pledged the signers to a tightening of the antifilibuster rule. As a result, rule XXII was amended, not in such a way as to make it easier to break a filibuster, but to make it a bit more difficult.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, at this point will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield for a question.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not true that the Senators who participated in that successful effort constituted a majority of the Senate?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; that is true.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thought the Senator from Illinois had been calling for action by a majority of the Senate, when they wished it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was describing the sequence of events.

Mr. HOLLAND. But it is a fact, is it not, that a majority of the Senate elected to put an end to that fruitless debate, and did so by taking the action, as a majority of the Senate, which the distinguished Senator from Illinois has described? That is true, is it not?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does the Senator from Illinois object to the right of a majority of the Senate to take action of that kind?

Mr. DOUGLAS. They had a right to take that action for the Senate which then was sitting. But in the argument which we advanced on yesterday, I believe we made it clear to all Members but the Senator from Florida, that that action was improper insofar as binding future Senates was concerned.

(At this point Mr. DOUGLAS yielded to enable the Presiding Officer to lay before the Senate messages from the House of Representatives announcing the death of three Members of that body, and to permit appropriate action to be taken by the Senate. The proceedings in connection therewith appear in the RECORD at the conclusion of the speech of Mr. DOUGLAS.)

Mr. DOUGLAS. Let the RECORD show that there has been considerable interval between the time the Senator from Illinois was speaking on the subject and the present moment, during which other matter was entered into the RECORD.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit, perhaps it would be well for me to continue the colloquy in which we were engaged.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator from Florida. I shall be glad to yield for a question in a moment. I should like to regain the thread of my discussion, if I may, and then I will yield for a question.

Mr. HOLLAND. Very well.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The effort of the Truman administration and the supposed support of the Truman administration was for a proposal to substitute majority cloture for the provision requiring two-thirds of those present and voting, which had prevailed from 1917.

What we wound up with, however, was a slight tightening—and a very slight tightening, as it has turned out—of rule XXII, whereby the number required to impose limitation on debate was changed from two-thirds of those present and voting to two-thirds of those duly elected and sworn. That is sometimes referred to as a constitutional two-thirds, or two-thirds of the constitutional number of the Members of the Senate.

There was also added section 3, which we have been discussing for the past two days, which in effect provided that there could be no cloture whatsoever on any motion to bring up a change in the rules. Then there was a further proviso, which was a slight loosening of the rule, that cloture could be applied not merely to proposed legislation itself but to the motion to take it up.

Those were the changes made in 1949, when only 38 of the present members were Senators. It has been under those rules that we have operated for the past 10 years.

NINETEEN HUNDRED AND FORTY-NINE CLOTURE RULES ALSO PROVED UNWORKABLE

In the spring and summer of 1950 the Democratic Party in the Senate brought out of committee an FEPC bill, and in May that was brought up in the Senate and again subjected to a filibuster.

After the debate had continued for some time the majority leader moved to enable the Senate to impose cloture and limit debate. He received 52 affirmative votes, and only 32 negative votes were cast. The motion failed to carry, and it would have failed to carry under the 1917 provision as well as under the 1949 provision, which was then in effect.

Two months later, in August, the majority leader, my friend and colleague, Senator Lucas, again brought up FEPC and sought to reach a vote by a motion under rule XXII. The vote on limiting debate at that time was 55 affirmative votes and 33 negative votes. Once again the movement for cloture failed, and it would have failed under the 1917 rule as well as under the 1949 rule.

CLOTURE RULES IN 1917 AND 1949 WERE ALMOST EQUALLY INEFFECTIVE

I think we can summarize the entire situation since 1917 as follows: There have been 22 attempts at cloture, 9 of which have commanded a majority of the total Senate membership, but only 4 of which were successful under the rule then prevailing, the 1917 rule. The introduction of the 1949 rule would have reduced this number to three. In other words, in the entire history of attempts to curb the filibuster, the difference between two-thirds of those present and voting, which was the rule from 1917 to 1949, and two-thirds of the entire membership of the Senate, which has been the rule for the past 10 years, was infinitesimal—only 1 out of 22 occasions.

I think it should also be noted that no cloture has ever been applied on a civil rights measure. No cloture has ever been obtained on any measure whatsoever since 1927, when the Bureau of Customs and the Bureau of Prohibition were created.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield to the Senator from New York, who has done extremely good work as chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Rules and Administration which considered this question.

Mr. JAVITS. I should like to address an inquiry to my colleague from Illinois bearing exactly on the point he is discussing. Does my colleague agree with me that the use of the word "meaningless" in reference to the Johnson resolution, and the use of the word "reasonable" in reference to the Douglas proposal is justified by the following facts, which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE] and I learned in our work on the subcommittee?

First, there is the fact that the Vice President has already given an advisory opinion, which knocks out the idea that there can be indefinite debate on a change of the rules. Then there is the fact that if we establish the standard of the Johnson resolution, namely, two-thirds of the Senators present and voting, we go back to the 1917 rule.

If we add those two facts together, is it not true that we are faced, in the Johnson resolution, with a meaningless measure?

JOHNSON RESOLUTION IS A RETURN TO THE INEFFECTIVE 1917 CLOTURE RULE

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from New York is entirely correct. What the Johnson resolution proposes is that we go back to the 1917 rule, a rule which proved to be virtually completely ineffective so that the will of the majority during the 32 years it was in operation was thwarted time and again.

Mr. JAVITS. What we are told we are getting is that from that point on, if we adopt the Johnson resolution, we can invoke cloture by two-thirds of the Senators present and voting, on a proposal to amend the rules, whereas now, according to the rules, we could never invoke cloture. In view of the fact that the Vice President has already given an advisory constitutional opinion, and that my sensory nerve tells me that many Senators agree with him, that certainly makes the Johnson resolution meaningless. We are not only getting nothing, but we are getting less than nothing, because we are getting less than what the advisory opinion would give us.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct.

Mr. JAVITS. As to the reasonableness of the proposal of the Senator from Illinois, if the Senator's rule had been applied to 22 cloture votes, cloture would have been successful on 9 occasions—not 20, 21, or 19, but 9.

Despite the argument of Senators whom I honor and respect, in regard to unlimited debate and the right to be heard, there is cloture now. It is only a question of degree. Two-thirds of those elected and sworn can close off debate now, and invoke all the thunderbolts from heaven that have been described. So we are dealing with questions of degree. Shall it be by two-thirds, by a majority, or shall it be by 50 or 66? If we were to apply the 50 rule, there would have been 9 successful cloture votes out of 22.

I respectfully submit that no one could say that it would be unreasonable to apply cloture if in 9 cases out of 22, less than a majority, the effort would have been successful under the rule. I therefore ask the Senator if it does not seem to him that, on the merits, and based upon the facts, the record, and the history, rather than the pronouncements today, the solution which the Senator from Illinois is proposing is reasonable, fair, and moderate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator from New York. He is exactly correct. The proposal of the Senator from Illinois and his colleagues is really a middle-of-the-road proposal. We are not proposing that cloture should be applied by a majority of those present and voting.

PENDING (DOUGLAS) AMENDMENT PROVIDES FOR CLOTURE BY MAJORITY OF ALL SENATORS, OR 50 VOTES

I regret that my good friend from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] is not present, because he seems to have fallen into a misapprehension on the subject. He said that 26, a majority of a quorum, could impose cloture. That is not true.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] has favored a rule providing for limitation by a majority of those voting.

The Senator from Illinois does not favor that proposal. He and his colleagues are now proposing that cloture be applied by a majority of Senators elected and sworn, which would be 50 out of the present number of 98 Senators. The Senator from Illinois and his colleagues are therefore adopting a very moderate, middle-of-the-road position.

We regret that the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] has become an extremist on this subject. He has gone far over to the right. The much celebrated moderation does not characterize him on this issue. What he is proposing is the old 1917–49 rule. He does not propose to go forward. He proposes to go backward. He proposes to restore a rule which operated very poorly for a third of a century.

FILIBUSTER DEFENDERS ACKNOWLEDGE JOHNSON RESOLUTION IS LITTLE DIFFERENT FROM PRESENT RULE XXII

Those who are experienced know this very well. The distinguished senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], one of the most charming Members of this body, and perhaps the most skilled parliamentarian in this body, made the following statement yesterday, as reported in Associated Press dispatch No. 24, which I took from the ticker in the lobby:

> Senator RUSSELL said that the southerners opposing any change in the rules would not filibuster against a motion to take up JOHNSON'S proposal tomorrow or at any other time.
> Asked if the southerners were reconciled to accepting the Johnson proposal, RUSSELL said he and others would oppose it on the merits but did not expect as many or as long speeches against it as there would have been on ANDERSON'S motion.
> And he added, significantly, that two-thirds of those present and voting is little different from two-thirds of the full membership because "most Senators would be present, anyway, on a disputed question."

How right he is. The distinguished commentator, Mr. Walter Lippmann, who unfortunately is supporting the Johnson proposal, in an article in the Washington Post and Times Herald on Christmas Day, correctly stated:

> So the Johnson proposal is not substantially different from the existing rule.

The point is that during the consideration of civil rights measures there are not many absentees. The pressure from home compels Senators to attend. Therefore the number of those voting tends to be very close to the total of those elected. In the old days, when the press was less alert, and when organizations back home were not sufficiently informed, it was possible for Senators to dodge yea-and-nay votes on these measures by very convenient attacks of the flu or other diseases, which made it impossible for them to attend. In that way they could always say, "Well, I would have voted for the civil rights measure if I had attended, but, being unable to attend, I could not do so."

Yea-and-nay votes are now being watched very carefully. As a result, in the last few years, the number of those who have voted on important civil rights tests has been very close to the total membership of the Senate.

In 1957, the motion to table the motion of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] was made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON]. That tabling motion carried. There were 55 votes in favor of tabling it, and 38 votes against tabling it, or a total vote of 93. There were then 96 Members of the Senate. That means that only three Senators did not vote.

Then there was another crucial vote in 1957 on the so-called jury trial amendment. The vote to require jury trials obtained 51 votes. The votes against the amendment were 42. A total of 93 Senators voted. Once again, only three Senators did not vote.

Today the vote on the motion to table the Anderson motion was 60 to 36. That is a total of 96 Senators out of the 98, who now form the Senate. Only one Senator was absent, Senator NEUBERGER, who is ill in Oregon. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH] obligingly gave him a live pair. Therefore, in reality, only one Senator was absent today.

I believe we can be pretty certain, therefore, that in the future, on civil rights measures, and at least on a measure of which the public is keenly aware, the number of absentees will not be great and that, in effect the number of Senators voting will be virtually equivalent to the number elected and sworn. Moreover the opponents of civil rights will have all of their votes here.

Therefore what the Senator from Texas is doing is offering us, in effect, the old rule, with a blue ribbon tied around its chin. It is the old rule. It is the old straitjacket.

In my judgment, the RECORD of the last few days indicates that probably on crucial measures we cannot expect more than three absentees. Therefore we would not expect fewer than 95 Senators to vote. Two-thirds of the entire membership of the Senate, which is the present rule, would require the affirmative vote of 66 Senators. Two-thirds of 95 Senators would require 64 affirmative votes.

Therefore, all we can say is that the Johnson resolution at most means the difference of only two votes. So far as this morning is concerned, it meant a difference of only one vote.

Therefore, in effect, we are not being offered anything new. We are being offered the old rule, which has largely been in operation since 1917. It is being passed off on the public as something new, something constructive, something near the middle of the road, something to represent the homogenized intellectual quality in most public discussions.

Those who stand for majority rule in accordance with the Constitution are being branded as extremists who have their daggers at the throat of the leadership.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Would the Senator from Illinois comment on section 2 of the Johnson resolution? It seems that at least some of our colleagues believe it to be a substantial improvement over the present rule. The Senator will recall that it eliminates the provision in the present rule which would permit an unlimited filibuster on a motion to change the rule.

Mr. HOLLAND. On a motion to take up.

Mr. CLARK. On a motion to take up a change in the rule; yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is a slight improvement. However, the next section worsens the rule by providing that the rules of the Senate shall continue from one Congress to the next.

Mr. CLARK. I was going to have something to say about the next point, but I have agreed to defer my question until after the Senator from Illinois has concluded his colloquy with the Senator from Florida, in the event the Senator from Florida desires to continue his colloquy.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania and also my distinguished friend from Illinois. At the time the House messages came to the Senate, we interrupted our colloquy, and at that time I believe the distinguished Senator from Illinois had conceded that action taken in 1949 was action by a substantial majority of the Senate, and that they had the right to take that action.

Mr. DOUGLAS. They had the right, but I believe it was extremely unwise for them to do so. Furthermore, I do not believe they had the constitutional right to bind future Senates.

Mr. HOLLAND. I understood that to be the Senator's position. I wish to address my next question to this point: Is it not true that in its action upon the Anderson amendment this morning, which was taken by a vote of 60 to 36—with the showing of the 2 remaining Senators dividing the Senate along the line of 61 to 37—the Senate took action by a decidedly strong majority?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; that is true. However, I am reluctant to believe that the vote this morning represents the opinion of the Senate or the country on the general question of filibuster. I believe it represents in the minds of many a parliamentary technicality. We tried to warn Senators that it was likely to be cited as a strong vote in favor of protecting the filibuster. However I am afraid there were some Senators, particularly new Members, who did not fully realize the significance of the vote they cast.

Mr. HOLLAND. I do not share the distinguished Senator's feeling that some Members of the Senate do not share the intelligence possessed by the Senator from Illinois and by other Senators. I thought we all understood the action we took. The point I am trying to get at is this: The action taken was taken by a very large majority of the Senate. Is that not so?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes. Is the Senator from Florida contending that those who voted to table the Anderson motion were in effect voting to continue the rule which has prevailed from 1917 to 1949?

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator from Florida is contending that the action taken this morning in tabling the Anderson motion, which had been approved by the advisory opinion of the Vice President, the Presiding Officer of the Senate, was rather clear notice to the country and rather clear action by a heavy majority of the Senate that the Senate did not propose to take action which would open up the Senate on the beginning of each Congress to an attempt such as that made by the motion of the Senator from New Mexico and by the similar attempt of the Senator from New Mexico in 1957.

The Senator from Florida sees no other conclusion which can reasonably be drawn to explain the vote or the position of those Senators who this morning—61 of them in number—opposed the approval of the motion offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON].

The Senator from Florida is also of the opinion that the Senator from Illinois is underestimating the understanding of other Senators who, he says, in his opinion, did not understand the vote which they cast and the effect of the proposal offered by the Senator from New Mexico, which they voted to table.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think the effect of that vote, psychologically and procedurally, has been to support those who are opposed to any meaningful change in the rules governing filibusters. That has been the effect. I have sufficient faith in a number of Senators, however, to believe that this was not the intention of some of them. I agree that the effect has been to strengthen the forces who, under Senator JOHNSON, want to defend the filibuster. It is my faith in my fellow men which leads me to believe that this was not their purpose.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question, which has already been touched upon ably by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK]?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. The next point I was about to make was that instead of being ungenerous, as the Senator from Illinois has suggested, the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] was generous in the concessions he was making in his resolution, especially, it seems to me, in the additional provision proposed to be added to the cloture rule, just mentioned by the Senator from Pennsylvania, namely, that under the rule as suggested by the Senator from Texas there would not be allowed unlimited debate on a motion to take up a proposed change of the rule, but, instead, the same cloture machinery would lie against such a proposal as would lie against any other motion to take up, or against any other pending measure.

It seems to me that that is not only a distinct change in the cloture rule as proposed now by the resolution of the Senator from Texas, but is also a very meaningful change. I remember numerous instances when those who did not want to have any inhibitions at all placed upon actions by a bare majority of the Senate have cited that particular provision in the pending resolution as being most objectionable—that is, that cloture does not lie at all, under the present cloture rule, to a motion to take up a proposed change in a rule. Yet if I have understood the distinguished Senator correctly, he feels that that proposed addition to the rule, a very meaningful change in the rule as proposed by the Senator from Texas, is without meaning, and is, as I believe he termed it, a mere blue ribbon tied to the present cloture rule.

Mr. DOUGLAS. A blue ribbon tied to the neck of Cerberus who guards the gates of hell.

Mr. HOLLAND. May I ask the Senator from Illinois if he does not think he was a little severe in his judgment and that, to the contrary, the proposal made by the Senator from Texas is a meaningful one and a rather generous departure from the existing rule?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No. I am really astonished at my own moderation, both in the proposal which I make and in the comments I have just made about the proposal of the Senator from Texas.

As a matter of fact, if we proceed under rule XXII, as proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], the two-thirds requirement is sufficiently effective to protect a filibuster on matters to which a given section of the country, although a minority of the whole Nation, is opposed.

We know what is behind all this. It is the civil rights question which is behind it. We all know that the articulate white population of the South, although not the entire white population of the South—and certainly not the Negro population of the South—is opposed to Federal action to protect the rights of minorities within the States. We know that. I believe they are a minority, and a very small minority, in the Nation.

But because of their representation in the Senate, because of alliances which they form with other States, generally small States, they are able to prevent debate from being limited, and therefore, by interminable discussion and by the threats of a filibuster, are able to prevent a measure from coming to a vote.

I think it should be crystal clear by now that the attempt to say what was said today—that a majority can at any time pass a measure if it is put to a vote—begs the question.

The point is that with rules governing a filibuster it is impossible to bring many vital measures to a vote. There will be interminable discussion. It will not be possible to get cloture, and the measure will die, even though a majority—and a large majority—of the Nation desires it.

Thus I say, so far as rule XXII is concerned, that two-thirds is about as effective as unanimous consent.

There is one other point I want to make, although I am a little afraid I may be giving away our hand to the opposition.

Mr. HOLLAND. We will have no objection to the Senator's doing so, if he cares to do it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I know that; but the Senator from Florida is opposed to the principle for which some of us are trying to contend. I was greatly intrigued yesterday when the majority leader invoked, not rule XXII, but rule XL, in order to get action within 1 day on a motion to change a rule.

It is possible—and I am sure the astute parliamentarian considered it—that this is an escape hatch by which we can operate in the future to produce a change in the rules. But I throw this in simply as an aside and to indicate that no real concession has been made by section 2 of the Johnson resolution.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. No one can doubt the astuteness of the distinguished Senator from Illinois. I have generally been willing to concede that he has a quite generous disposition. But I have not yet heard him either recognize or acknowledge the fact that the Senator from Texas was supported by a very generous position on the part of many who do not favor any change in the present rule, in that no objection at all was made to the taking up of Senate Resolution 5; whereas, as the Senator well knows, under the present rule, an unlimited filibuster could have been directed at that action.

I wonder why the Senator from Illinois has not given voice to the generous feeling of appreciation which he no doubt has because of that action, or lack of action, on the part of many who want no change at all in the present cloture rule.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad the Senator from Florida has raised that question, because I will explain the situation to him very concretely.

This is a matter of history. In 1953, much the same group which is now seeking a meaningful change in the filibuster rule developed the plan under which one of our number, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], offered the same motion which he presented today. It was substantially the same motion. It obtained only 21 votes. The newspapers and some of the anti-civil-rights commentators declared that the little group of despicable liberals had gone down to inglorious defeat.

We, I thought, made a mistake in 1955 when we did not raise the issue again, because we wanted to preserve party harmony and to enable the Senator from Texas to proceed with the minimum of friction. So the issue was not raised in 1955. I took a part in deciding that it should not be raised in 1955. Former Senator Lehman, of New York, felt that we should raise it. In retrospect, I am convinced that Senator Lehman was right, and I was wrong.

But in 1957 we made the same effort, and in the days which followed once again the same columnists and pundits all said that the little group of liberals would be ingloriously swamped.

The vote came; and instead of getting 21 votes, we polled 38 votes. The three Senators who did not vote declared themselves to be in favor of the Anderson motion. So in effect 41 Members of the Senate said they favored the Anderson motion and, therefore, were in favor of a meaningful change in rule XXII. This threw the defenders of the filibuster into a cold sweat. They realized that the drive against the filibuster was gathering weight and momentum—and this comment applies to the leaders of both parties—and they looked around for a measure which would retain the essence of the filibuster, although appearing to make a concession to the advocates of reform. So they came up with the so-called Johnson-Knowland amendment, or Senate Resolution 30, of the 85th Congress. That amendment is identical to the resolution which now has been submitted by the Senator from Texas.

RULES COMMITTEE IN 1958 FAVORABLY REPORTED RULE CHANGE RESOLUTION LIKE PENDING (DOUGLAS) AMENDMENT

A number of us sponsored another resolution, namely, Senate Resolution 17, which contained the substance of the amendment we now are proposing. That resolution provided for ultimate cloture—and I emphasize the word "ultimate"—by a majority of the Senators elected and sworn.

Those two alternatives, plus the proposal of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], were before the Committee on Rules and Administration. They were referred to a subcommittee consisting of the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE]. Those two Senators held long hearings, and went into those matters thoroughly. The hearings have been published in a volume comprising 364 pages.

Incidentally, Mr. President, I was somewhat surprised when the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia said he never had read that proposal, which is the same as the proposal now before the Senate. The pending proposal is the same as the proposal which was submitted to the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration on January 7, 1957. It was printed at the time. It was printed in the hearings of that committee. Testimony was taken on it; and—and this is the important point—after a full discussion of the various alternatives, the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration on April 30, 1958, by a vote of 5 to 4 reported it favorably; and therefore it went on the calendar, for action.

I wish to pay tribute to the members of the Committee on Rules and Administration for their action—and particularly to three members of the committee, namely, our good friend, the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS]; our good friend, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE]; and the fine chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS]. I wish to say that the historical material which the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE] submitted illuminated and made clear many features of senatorial history and procedure which until that time had been unknown or forgotten.

When we read the report and the supplemental statements made by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE] as of last summer, we see that there was full control over debate in the Senate up to approximately the time of the Civil War; that there was no tradition of unlimited debate; that for a time the moving of the previous question applied; that when that was discontinued, the Presiding Officer of the Senate always had the power to call Members to order for speaking tediously or beside the point; that, in reality, the principle of full and unlimited debate without any limitation whatever came in only in the 1870's, largely when in 1872 Vice President Schuyler Colfax ruled "under the practice of the Senate, the Presiding Officer could not restrain a Senator in remarks which the Senator considers pertinent to the pending issue"; and that from the 1870's to 1917 there was no limitation; that then, as a result of a filibuster in connection with the attempt to arm the merchant marine, the rule that debate could be limited by the affirmative votes of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting was instituted; and that this continued to 1949; and so forth, and so on.

The result was that Senate Resolution 17 was reported to the Senate; and, in July, a full debate was had on the floor of the Senate. I well remember the very able speeches which were made by the Senator from New York and the Senator from New Jersey. Every opportunity was given to consider the measure. Yet it was not called up for action.

Mr. HOLLAND. Did the Senator from Illinois ever make a motion to call it up for action?

Mr. DOUGLAS. As the Senator from Florida well knows, control of the floor is in the hands of the majority leader. I defy any Senator to attempt to take the floor away from the majority leader; and I think we all know that. The majority leader stands in the center aisle, and takes control of the floor, and lets it out only to the Senators whom he wants to have given the floor.

Furthermore, the majority leader always has a motion or a measure pending before the Senate, so that other Senators had no opportunity to secure action. So the decision not to bring up this measure was the decision of the majority leader and of the Democratic Policy Committee, and I think the responsibility should be clearly placed at their doors.

It pains me to say that, because I think I am a loyal Democrat. But I have to tell the truth; and the record is that the Democratic leadership of the Senate prevented the Senate for even considering that measure. We anticipated that. We urged them to permit the Senate to consider it; but then we said that if they did not permit the Senate to consider it, we would bring it up in the first days of the coming Congress. So that is what we are doing now.

Therefore, the Senator from Georgia has had full and ample opportunity to study this measure. If he has not studied it—and I accept his word—that has been because of the burden of other duties, and perhaps because his administrative assistant has not kept him precisely informed in regard to what was going on.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois is going far afield. I wonder whether he was remiss in not pointing out that the Senator from Texas was consistent in attempting to bring out a measure such as Senate Resolution 5, and was not included among those who favor filibustering to death such a measure, as is now permitted under the existing Senate rule. I have not heard the Senator from Illinois reply to my question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the Senator from Florida wishes a reply, I shall give it. Because the defenders of the filibuster knew they could not stop a change, and knew they had to permit some sort of change to be made, they devised a strategy which would have the appearance of change, but without making any change of substance. That is precisely what the Johnson resolution is.

Mr. President, this afternoon many references were made by Members to their boyhood. When I was a boy, I went to a county fair in Maine. I did not have much money, but I always liked root beer. In one of the side shows, I saw an enormous stein of root beer; it contained at least a quart and a half, and it was advertised for sale at a price of only one nickel. I think I had three nickels in my pocket at the time. The idea of getting a quart and a half of root beer appealed very much to me and I considered buying it. The day was a hot one. So I took the nickel out of my pocket, and paid my 5 cents, and got that huge stein of root beer, and started to drink it. But then I found it was nothing but water with some coloring matter in it.

In this case, I wish to say that is about what the Senator from Texas and the defenders of the filibuster are now trying to put over on the American people; they are giving us a fake—in other words, root beer with a little coloring matter, but no substance to it. I only hope that the Senate and the country do not fall for this flimflam.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield at this point?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I noticed the Senator's reference to the attitude of the pundits. I do not believe he would put Mr. William S. White among the group of persons to whom he refers as pundits, would he?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Oh, yes; I would.

Mr. HOLLAND. If that be the case, I think the Senator from Illinois will be interested in the following comment appearing today in the column of William S. White, who I think is one of the best informed men about the Senate that there is in the Nation. He said this, and I think the Senator will be interested in his statement:

> The advanced liberals in both parties have got off to a very poor start in trying to change the Senate filibuster rule. * * * Naturally they set out under the leadership of Senators PAUL H. DOUGLAS, Democrat of Illinois, and JACOB K. JAVITS, Republican of New York, with impossible rather than attainable demands. They wish to have the Senate agree that a filibuster can be halted hereafter by a bare majority or a margin of one vote—

Mr. DOUGLAS. I may say, our amendment requires a majority of the entire membership of the Senate, not a bare majority of those voting.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator has just said it is no trick to get Senators to be present when a question of this kind is being considered.

I continue to quote from Mr. White as follows:

> The obvious reality is that most of the Senate (including many authentic liberals) knows this to be indefensible extremism.

I desist from quoting at that point. I am going to ask the distinguished Senator if he is willing to confess that his effort at this time is as stated by one of the leading constitutional authorities of the Nation, at least as to the objectives sought to be attained by establishing the Senate, and as to the history of the Senate, and that this characterization of Mr. White as indefensible extremism is a sound and appropriate term to apply to his present effort.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Of course not, and I regret that the Senator from Florida has brought in the name of Mr. White into this discussion. Mr. White is a very charming gentleman. He is a master of style. He happens to be a southerner who has come north and has prospered greatly with the property of northern newspapers. He is in fact a great admirer of Senator JOHNSON, and his views nearly always agree with those of the Senator from Texas.

In fact he has said in his book that "the Senate might be described without too much violence to fact as the South's unending revenge upon the North for Gettysburg"—page 68. As I have viewed the proceedings here, during the last 10 years, I sometimes wonder who won the war from 1861 to 1865.

Mr. HOLLAND. It is Mr. White, is it not, who terms the Senate as the last citadel of freedom, and has titled his book on the Senate "The Citadel"?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would say that he regards the Senate as the last citadel of the southern opponents of human rights.

Mr. HOLLAND. If the Senator will yield for one more question, I should like to ask him his comments on this quotation. Mr. White says:

> The obvious reality is that most of the Senate (including many authentic liberals) knows this to be indefensible extremism.

In that number Mr. White would include the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH], and many of the other Senators who, in addition to the 18 southern Senators, have voted to adopt the rule of 1949, and who voted to defeat ingloriously the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], for himself, the Senator from Illinois, and other Senators this morning.

I am wondering if the Senator from Illinois is going to deny the statement by Mr. White that many authentic liberals, including the ones I have named, and many others, regard the present effort, the present amendment of the Senator from Illinois, as indefensible extremism.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am sure Mr. White regards it as indefensible extremism. I am sure the Senator from Texas regards it as indefensible extremism. I am sure the Senator from Florida regards it as indefensible extremism. I am sure the advocates of white supremacy regard it as indefensible extremism.

Mr. HOLLAND. What about the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY]?

Mr. DOUGLAS. But it is interesting to note that the paper which used to employ Mr. White, and which does not now, the New York Times, in two editorials, including an editorial this morning, came out very strongly for the proposal which some 16 of us are advocating.

I may say to my good friend, I do not think it matters what Mr. White thinks, or what Mr. Lippmann thinks. These matters should be considered on their merits.

Mr. HOLLAND. What about Mr. Krock?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes. They are all decent men, but their views are not controlling. We can take them into consideration, but they are not Members of the Senate.

Mr. HOLLAND. The views of 61 Senators are controlling, and they were controlling, were they not, on the Anderson amendment this morning?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have not admitted we are going to be defeated either on this motion or on the motions which, if my amendment is rejected, will follow.

I think the Senator from Florida, if I may be forgiven for this statement, has been expressing a sort of lean-to philosophy. He leans on other people rather than being able to stand alone on the merits of the question.

I have never been afraid of taking a position which I thought was right, even though a majority of a given body might think it wrong.

DEMOCRATIC PARTY PLATFORMS OF 1952 AND 1956 ENDORSED PRINCIPLE OF PENDING (DOUGLAS) AMENDMENT

Now, the Senator from Florida is ostensibly a member of the Democratic Party. I should like to remind the Senator of the platform which our party adopted, both in 1952 and in 1956, which I shall now read:

> In order that the will of the American people may be expressed upon all legislative proposals, we urge that action be taken at the beginning of the 86th Congress to improve congressional procedures—

Now listen to this—

> so that majority rule prevails and decisions can be made after reasonable debate without being blocked by a minority in either House.

That was the plank which our party adopted in 1952. Identical language was adopted in 1956. The leadership of our party here in the Senate rejected it in 1953, although, I am happy to say, a considerable number of us supported it. The leadership of our party in the Senate did not act upon it in 1955. The leadership of our party, including the Senator from Florida, defeated it in 1957.

We are now proposing this amendment in an effort to make good this pledge at long last. That is what we are trying to do this year. Again we find the leadership of our party in the Senate opposing it.

One of the tragedies of this situation—and I dislike to say this—is that we adopt planks in our conventions, pledging ourselves to these principles; then we come into the Senate and find we are hogtied by the rules of the Senate, and that men who ran on the Democratic platform repudiate in practice the declarations of their platform.

If I am taking a position of "indefensible extremism," as Mr. White suggests, so is the Democratic Party taking a position of indefensible extremism; but I did not notice, in the campaigns of 1952 or 1956, that many Democrats repudiated the Democratic Party platform. But if we do not carry out the pledge this time, we shall be accused, and I think properly so, of going back upon campaign promises which we have made. And, believe me, the American people will know. One cannot fool the American people all the time. If in 1960 we once again put such a declaration in our platform, having defeated the proposal this time, one can imagine the guffaws which will go up all over the country. Our friends on the other side of the aisle will not be slow in pointing this out.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. So, my friends, the honor of our party as well as the welfare of our Nation is at stake. I do not propose to stand here and be crucified by being called an indefensible extremist when I am merely proposing that we carry out the program of the Democratic Party.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does the Senator regard the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the distinguished senior Senator of all the Senate, as well as the senior Senator of the Democratic Party, the distinguished senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], and the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH] as ostensible Democrats only, because their convictions differ from his in this important regard and because they are opposing him on this matter?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I imagine what the Senator from Florida is trying to do is to inveigle me into indulging in personal comments.

Mr. HOLLAND. I have not attempted to do so, but that has been the result.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad the Senator has confessed that he is trying to range me against these other Senators. I thought that was the purpose. I make no judgment on the motives of these Senators. They are my personal friends. He has not succeeded in his efforts to sow personal discord.

I merely say that the action of the Democratic leadership in the Senate has been contrary to the pledges of the National Democratic Party, and that is one of the tragedies of the situation.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No, I want to finish this thought.

Mr. HOLLAND. I should like to make one comment only, if I may.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator can make the comment afterward.

Mr. HOLLAND. The use of the word "ostensible" brings back memories to me, because I served as a member of the drafting committee in Chicago which brought forth the platform.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Did the Senator approve of it?

Mr. HOLLAND. I did not, and a good many who served on the committee did not.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Did the Senator repudiate the platform?

Mr. HOLLAND. No, but I voted against it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Did the Senator feel himself bound?

Mr. HOLLAND. Not in this particular, just as the Senator has not been bound by all provisions of the platform.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator is correct. Let me say that I think a candidate of the Democratic Party or of the Republican Party has the right and indeed the duty, if he disagrees with a plank in the party platform, to say so and to free himself from any obligation.

But if he campaigns on the platform and does not specifically repudiate the platform, and then later votes against a provision which was in the platform, I say he has broken faith with the people and with the party.

I do not know what any of the circumstances were in connection with the Senators referred to. They are all my friends. I like them very much. I am not going to pass judgment on them. I am going to argue on the merits of the case, rather than upon the virtue or lack of virtue of individuals. I am quite prepared to admit that they are far more virtuous than I am, and probably have a much better chance with St. Peter than I will have.

Mr. HOLLAND. In closing on this matter, Mr. President, I will say the Senator from Florida regards it as unusually ungenerous on the part of his distinguished friend from Illinois to have termed the Senator from Florida an ostensible Democrat, when he has run for office on his convictions, on his own platform, before his own people, and was renominated last September in the Democratic primary by the largest majority ever received by a senatorial candidate in a hotly contested race in the history of Florida, and when other distinguished colleagues of the Senator from Illinois who are Democrats, such as the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH], who are only a small part of those who join with the 18 southern Senators in comprising the huge majorities which have been rolled up for a fair cloture rule, take the same position. The Senator should not term us all ostensible Democrats simply because our convictions happen to differ with his. I hope that the Senator will recall those words.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will say I got into this part of the discussion only to rebut the charge that our proposal was one of "indefensible extremism," which the Senator from Florida seemed to believe. I wish to make no reflection upon the Senator, and I should like to have the word "ostensible" stricken from the RECORD.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator. I am sure the Senator takes the same position with reference to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH].

Mr. DOUGLAS. It was the Senator from Florida, not the Senator from Illinois, who brought in their names. I made no reflection against them despite the fact that the Senator seems to be trying to make it appear that I have.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator gives them the right to have convictions?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly they have a right to have convictions. I merely point out that those who vote against the ability of the majority to limit debate are voting against the Democratic platform. That is true. The Democratic platform of 1952 and the Democratic platform of 1956 so provided. Those are facts and one cannot get around those facts.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator, provided I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Illinois may yield to me without losing his right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARTKE in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the names of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] be added as cosponsors of the amendment which I submitted yesterday, which is now at the desk, numbered 1–8–59–B.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield for a question.

Mr. CLARK. Returning, after a brief interruption, to the subject of my good friend, Mr. White, and the comments which were made about him by the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND], it occurs to me that the record should show that the definition of a liberal is largely in the eyes of the beholder, and that what may seem to be a liberal in Mr. White's eyes—and I suspect in the eyes of the late Alton B. Parker, who ran for President on the Democratic ticket, as I recall, in 1904—would not be the definition of a liberal in the eyes of some of those who have had the great good fortune to join this distinguished body in the Year of our Lord 1959.

While I read with the greatest interest a book about the Senate, entitled "The Citadel," which Mr. White wrote, and while I am more than honored to have a presentation copy of that book, which was given by the distinguished majority leader to all new Democrats who joined the Senate in 1956, while I value not only the majority leader's signature on the book, but also the signature of the author, Mr. White, I am afraid that after a brief period of 2 years in this body I would not like to think that the Senate was what Mr. White thinks it is.

So with the greatest of friendship toward him—and I have it, and I think he is fond of me, because he has said so—I do not believe that Mr. White's views on the filibuster problem are exactly contemporary. I think they are just a little obsolescent, and possibly even obsolete.

In that connection, I ask my friend from Illinois if he had the privilege of reading a column on the filibuster which Mr. White wrote perhaps 6 weeks ago, and the answer to that column written by a distinguished former member of this body, former Senator Lehman, of New York, and published in the Washington Evening Star.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I read both Mr. White's column and Senator Lehman's reply. I placed Senator Lehman's reply in the RECORD. It was published this morning.

I have never seen any argument demolished so thoroughly as Mr. White's argument was demolished by Senator Lehman. The demolition of Mr. White's argument was almost equivalent to the demolition by some of the armies in 1865.

Mr. CLARK. My friend uses strong words in connection with those columns. I would not go quite that far. However, I would express my view that it seems to me that, to the objective and modern observer, Senator Lehman had substantially the better of the argument. Mr. White was entitled to his views then. He is entitled to his views now. But it seems to me that when he suggests that those of us who are supporting the proposal of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE], are characterized as "indefensible extremists," or rather that our point of view is that of "indefensible extremism," he is going pretty far. I suppose we would look pretty extreme to Louis XVI. I suppose some of the Bourbons would have thought that those of us who want to establish majority rule in the Senate were going pretty far. All I can say is that it seemed to me, as it seemed to a majority of the Committee on Rules and Administration last year, and as it seemed to the Democratic Party when it wrote its platforms in 1952 and 1956, that this is a pretty moderate measure which is being brought forward now to bring the Senate into line with practically every other civilized deliberative body in the free world.

My friends, who are more erudite than I, can correct me, I am sure, if I am mistaken, but at the moment I do not know of any other legislative body in which it is so easy to prevent the will of the majority from becoming effective. The only precedent I can think of is that of the Polish Diet back in the 18th century, shortly before that country was carved up between Austria, Russia, and Prussia. It was necessary to obtain unanimous approval in the upper body of the Polish Diet in order to pass any legislation. It is thought by many historians that that particular provision played a greater part than anything else in the extinction of Poland as a free nation.

If I may have the attention briefly of my friend from Illinois, having said all I care to say about my good friend Mr. White, I should like to pass very briefly to a comment made by my good friend from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND], who I note is still in the Chamber.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me in order that I may make a statement with reference to Mr. White at this time?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Of course, this column was written before the vote of today. The burden of his statement was that an impossible and impractical program had been advanced under the leadership of the distinguished Senators named by him.

It seems to me that he was an excellent prophet, when we consider the vote today of 61 to 37, including the expressions of the two Senators who did not vote, indicating that the great majority of the Senate agrees with Mr. White, that the suggestions made by the small group of flaming liberals are anything but practical, and are extreme.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I do not wish unduly to detain my good friend from Florida, who, I know, has a dinner engagement with guests, but I do intend to ask my good friend from Illinois a couple of questions on that subject a little later. If the Senator from Florida desires to remain, we shall be very happy indeed to have him join our friendly little discussion.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania permit the Senator from Illinois to yield to me?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, who has the floor?

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Illinois has the floor. I am happy to withhold my comments.

Mr. JAVITS. I apologize to my colleague from Pennsylvania. However, my observation bears directly on the question of our being extreme in our view.

I point out the history of the limitation of debate in the upper bodies of every American legislature. That is pretty good evidence. If the Senator will allow me, I shall ask unanimous consent to have this tabulation printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks, without the Senator from Illinois losing the floor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the tabulation be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the tabulation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LIMITATION OF DEBATE IN STATE SENATES

1. Alabama (1951): Debate may be limited by a vote of two-thirds of all the elected members upon a motion to that effect offered by the committee on rules (rule 19). No member shall speak more than twice on any question under debate, and none shall, without leave of the senate, consume more than 1 hour each time (rule 37).

2. Arizona (1951): Previous question authorized (rule XVIII). Presumably requires majority vote. "Jefferson's Manual" governs when not inconsistent (rule XXIX).

3. Arkansas (1951): Previous question authorized if seconded by at least five members (rule XV). Presumably required majority vote. Dilatory motions forbidden (rule XIV, sec. 19).

4. California (1951): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 41).

5. Colorado (1951): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule IX, subdivision 2). Debate may be limited not less than 1 hour after adoption of motion to that effect by majority vote (rule IX, 3).

6. Connecticut (1951): No previous question allowed (rulings, p. 39). No member may, without leave, speak more than twice on same question (rule 11). Remarks must be germane (rulings, p. 44).

7. Delaware (1951): "Robert's Rules of Order, Revised," to settle all parliamentary procedure (rule 38).

8. Florida (1951): A senator may not speak longer than 30 minutes nor more than twice on any one question without leave of the senate (rule 20). "Jefferson's Manual" governs whenever applicable and not inconsistent with standing rules (rule 77).

9. Georgia (1957): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 58). All individual speeches on bills and resolutions shall be limited to 30 minutes unless by leave of the senate (rule 15). The president of the senate "shall in his discretion suspend irrelevant debate and command silence whenever he may deem it needful" (rule 1).

10. Idaho (1947): Previous question authorized (rule 4), presumably by majority vote. General rules of parliamentary practice to govern in all cases not provided for (rule 23).

11. Illinois (1951): Previous question authorized (rule 54). No senator may speak more than 15 minutes at any one time without the consent of the senate (rule 33). "Robert's Rules of Order" govern provided not inconsistent (rule 72).

12. Indiana (1949): Previous question authorized (rule 17), presumably by majority vote. "Jefferson's Manual" applies to all points not covered (rule 52).

13. Iowa (1951): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 20). "Robert's Rules of Order" govern where not inconsistent (rule 42).

14. Kansas (1949): Previous question authorized (rule 27), apparently by majority vote (rule 20). No senator may speak more than twice on the same day on the same subject without leave of the senate (rule 7). "Robert's Rules of Order" apply whenever senate rules do not apply (rule 76).

15. Kentucky (1954): Previous question authorized by majority of senators voting (sec. 50).

16. Louisiana (1948): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 17). Debate may be limited by majority vote so that no senator shall speak longer than 1 hour at one time without leave (rule 9).

17. Maine (1957): No rule on limitation of debate but "Reed's Rules and Cushing's Law and Practice" to govern whenever aplicable and not inconsistent with standing rules (rule 37).

18. Maryland (1950): "Jefferson's Manual" to govern when not inconsistent with standing rules (rule 92).

19. Massachusetts (1956): Debate may be closed not less than 1 hour after adoption of motion to that effect (rule 47), presumably by majority vote. Cushing's Manual shall govern when not inconsistent with standing rules (rule 62).

20. Michigan (1951–52): Previous question authorized by majority vote of the senators present and voting (rule 65).

21. Minnesota (1955): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 24). "Jefferson's Manual" to govern when not inconsistent with standing rules (rule 51).

22. Mississippi (1948–52): Previous question authorized (rule 65), presumably by majority vote since Rules of United States House of Representatives govern on all questions not in conflict with rules (rule 59).

23. Missouri (1951): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 76).

24. Montana (1951): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule XIV). No senator shall speak more than twice in any one debate on the same day and at the same stage of the bill in exclusion of those who have not spoken (rule XII, 4).

25. Nebraska (1950): Previous question authorized by majority of elected members (rule 10, sec. 9). Gregg's Handbook shall govern when not inconsistent (rule 1). No member shall speak more than twice upon any one question during one legislative day (rule 4, sec. 10). Each day shall be considered a legislative day unless majority votes otherwise (rule 7, sec. 6).

26. Nevada (1951): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 18). "Mason's Manual" shall govern (rule 55).

27. New Hampshire (1951): Previous question authorized (rule 9) presumably by majority vote. No member shall speak more than twice on same question on same day without leave (rule 4).

28. New Jersey (1951): No Senator shall speak more than three times "on any subject of debate" without the leave of the senate (rule 47).

29. New Mexico (1951–52): Previous question authorized on demand of majority of members present (rule 54). "Robert's Rules of Order" to govern in all cases not inconsistent with standing rules (rule 74).

30. New York (1951): Debate may be limited by majority vote wherever any bill, resolution, or motion shall have been under consideration for 2 hours (rule XIV, sec 3).

31. North Carolina (1951): Previous question authorized (rule 57), presumably by majority vote (rule 63).

32. North Dakota (1951): Previous question authorized (rules 18, 21), presumably by majority vote. Ordinary member may speak only 10 minutes on same subject, then 5 minutes, until every other member choosing to speak shall have spoken, without unanimous consent (rule 13). Robert's Rules to govern when applicable and not inconsistent (rule 77).

33. Ohio (1951): Previous question authorized on demand of 3 senators (rule 89), presumably by majority vote. No senator shall speak more than twice on the same question except by leave (rule 74) and may read relevant matter "of reasonable length" (rule 75). Any recognized standard authority on parliamentary procedure may be received as authority for all cases not provided for (rule 117).

34. Oklahoma (1951): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 39). No senator shall speak more than 20 minutes on any question without the unanimous consent of the senate, and only 10 minutes during debate in considering bills on general order (rule 107).

35. Oregon (1951): Previous question authorized (rule 38) by majority vote (rule 69). No member shall speak more than twice on any question without leave (rule 25). After 50th day of session, member may not speak longer than minutes but may yield his time (rule 26). "Robert's Rules of Order, Revised" to govern.

36. Pennsylvania (1951–52): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 41). "Jefferson's Manual" to govern whenever applicable (rule 34).

37. Rhode Island (1951): Previous question authorized (rule 21). Debate may be closed on motion (presumably by majority vote) after any matter shall have been considered for 2 hours (rule 23).

38. South Carolina (1951): Debate may be limited by two-thirds of the senate (rule 14). No senator may speak more than 2 hours in any one legislative day on any one bill or resolution (rule 8).

39. South Dakota (1951): Motion for previous question authorized but must be seconded by one-seventh of the members elected and approved by a majority of those present (rule 53).

40. Tennessee (1949): Previous question authorized by vote to two-thirds of members present: if rejected, committee of rules may, upon demand of a majority of the members of the senate, submit rule fixing of limiting time for debate for adoption by majority of senate (rule 20).

41. Texas (1949): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 101).

42. Utah (1945): Previous question specifically forbidden (rule 45). No senator shall speak more than twice in any one debate on the same day, and at the same stage of the bill without leave (rule 42). "Robert's Rules of Order" govern whenever applicable and not inconsistent with senate rules.

43. Vermont (1950): Previous question forbidden (rule VIII, 55). No senator shall speak more than twice to same question without leave (rule X, 65). "Robert's Rules of Order" shall prevail (rule XIII, 82), on parliamentary questions not covered by the rules.

44. Virginia (1950): Previous question authorized if seconded by majority of senators present (rule 50), presumably by majority vote. "Jefferson's Manual" to be used to construe rules (rule 68).

45. Washington (1951): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 30).

46. West Virginia (1951): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 53).

47. Wisconsin (1949): Previous question authorized by majority vote (Manual, p. 40) on demand of six senators (82).

48. Wyoming (reprinted 1951): Previous question authorized when seconded by 3 members and approved by majority vote (pp. 19, 20).

APPENDIX

PREVENTION OF OBSTRUCTIVE TACTICS

"Robert's Rules of Order, Revised (1943)": Debate may be closed by a two-thirds vote of the assembly or by adopting the motion for the previous question which requires a two-thirds vote of those present and voting (sec. 44). No dilatory, absurd, or frivolous motions are allowed (sec. 40). "Whenever the Chair is satisfied that members are using parliamentary forms to obstruct business, he should either not recognize them or else rule them out of order" (sec. 40).

"Jefferson's Manual (1797)": "No one is to speak impertinently or beside the question, superfluously or tediously" (see XVII). No man may speak more than once on the same bill except to clear up a matter of fact or to explain a material part of his speech (sec. XVII). Previous question authorized by majority vote (see XXXIV, SLL).

It is ironical to note, Mr. President, that many of the States whose Senators have opposed effective limitation of debate here in the Senate have most effective rules limiting debate in their own upper chambers.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE IN AMERICAN STATE SENATES

Forty-five out of the forty-eight States, either by the previous question or other parliamentary devices, forbid filibustering in their upper chambers.

The motion for the previous question by majority vote is specifically authorized in 22 States—California, Colorado, Georgia, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, New York, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Washington, West Virginia, and Wyoming. In an additional 15—Arizona, Arkansas, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Massachusetts, Mississippi, New Hampshire, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Rhode Island, Virginia, and Wisconsin—the previous question is specifically authorized but the rule does not state the size of the majority required. It is apparent, however, from the other rules in these State manuals that a simple majority is all that is required. In addition to these 37 States, one State—Nebraska—provides for the previous question by the vote of the majority of those elected.

In four States—Delaware, Florida, Maryland, and Maine—there is no rule fixing debate but there are provisions that standard manuals of parliamentary procedure shall govern when not inconsistent with the standing rules. Robert's Rules of Order and other comparable manuals forbid filibustering of obstructive techniques and give the presiding officer effective powers to prevent such tactics. Two States—Utah and Vermont—specifically forbid the previous question but Robert's Rules of Order is specifically made applicable so that they might be added to the four States listed above which effectively prevent filibustering.

Finally, South Carolina, which provides for limitation of debate by a two-thirds vote, limits debate to 2 hours on any one bill, an effective protection against obstruction.

Of the remaining three States, Alabama has a rule which is almost identical with that of the U.S. Senate, namely, providing for limitation of debate by a vote of two-thirds of all elected members. Connecticut forbids the previous question and has no other rule to limit debate. New Jersey, likewise, has no effective rule except perhaps, the provision that no State senator may speak more than three times on any subject.

RULES FOR CONDUCTING BUSINESS IN THE SENATE OF THE CONFEDERATED STATES OF AMERICA (1862)

Rule IV: "No Senator shall speak more than twice in any one debate, on the same question and on the same day, without leave of a majority of the Senators present."

Rule VIII: "* * * every question of order shall be decided by the President without debate, subject to an appeal to the body."

Rule XI: "No motion shall be debated until the same shall receive a second, and when a motion shall be made and seconded, it shall be reduced to writing, if desired by the President or any Senator, delivered in at the table and read, before the same shall be debated."

Rule XIV: "* * * the motion to adjourn shall always be in order and decided without debate."

Rule XXV: "No motion for the previous question shall be entertained, but upon the call of any Senator for the question, if seconded by a majority of the Senators present, the vote shall immediately be taken on the pending question, whatever it may be, without further debate."

Rule XXVIII: "When the yeas and nays shall be called for by one-fifth of the Senators present, each Senator called upon shall declare openly and without debate his assent or dissent to the question, unless for special reason he be excused by the Senate."

Rule XLVIII: "The rules may be amended by a majority of Senators, on one day's notice being given."

JUNE 20, 1957.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask the Senator from New York this question: Is it not true that the Florida House, the house of the State from which the Senator from Florida comes, permits motions for the previous question?

Mr. JAVITS. The Florida rule provides that a Senator may not speak longer——

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am speaking of the house.

Mr. JAVITS. I do not have information as to the house; only with respect to the upper body.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The rule of the Florida House, according to a memorandum furnished me by the Library of Congress, reads as follows:

Motions for the previous question shall be decided without debate, provided the introducer of a resolution, bill, or motion * * * shall be allowed 5 minutes within which to discuss the same.

That is the Florida House, the house of the State from which the Senator from Florida comes.

SOUTHERN LEGISLATURES HAVE MORE RIGID CLOTURE RULES THAN PENDING (DOUGLAS) AMENDMENT

Is it not true that the vast majority of the southern legislatures permit the moving of the previous question?

Mr. JAVITS. The Senator has allowed me to put in the RECORD the table which shows the situation in the various legislatures. That is exactly the case. I should like to read what the present situation is. The situation in Florida described here came into being a little later than when the distinguished Senator from Florida served in that body. I read from this memorandum:

Florida (1951): A Senator may not speak longer than 30 minutes nor more than twice on any one question without leave of the Senate (rule 20). "Jefferson's Manual" governs whenever applicable and not inconsistent with standing rules (rule 77).

"Jefferson's Manual," of course, states that the previous question may be authorized by majority vote.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is it not extraordinary that southern Senators, whose own State legislatures have a most rigid guillotine, should object to a mild limitation on debate which would permit from 5 to 8 weeks of debate?

Mr. JAVITS. I certainly agree with my colleague. The summary attached to the memorandum shows the following:

Forty-five out of the forty-eight States either by the previous question or other parliamentary devices, forbid filibustering in their upper chambers.

The motion for the previous question by majority vote is specifically authorized in 22 States.

In an additional 15 States the previous question is specifically authorized, but the rule does not state the size of the majority required.

Generally it refers to the "Robert's Rules of Order," which requires two-thirds of those present and voting, or to "Jefferson's Manual," which requires a majority.

That accounts for most of the States.

In four States there is no rule fixing debate, but there are provisions that standard manuals of parliamentary procedure shall govern when not inconsistent with the standing rules.

Two States specifically forbid the previous question, but "Robert's Rules of Order" is specifically made applicable, so that they might be added to the four States listed above which effectively prevent filibustering.

South Carolina has a unique situation. It provides for a limitation of debate by a two-thirds vote, and a limitation on debate of 2 hours on any one bill.

In three States there are no set rules. Alabama has a rule which is almost identical with that of the U.S. Senate. Connecticut forbids the previous question and has no other rule to limit debate. New Jersey—the distinguished senior Senator from New Jersey was in the Chamber a moment ago—has no effective rule, but it does provide that no State senator may speak more than three times on any subject.

One other point should be made, which may be interesting to the Senate. We find in most State legislatures rather strict control over germaneness and a rather strict administration of control, so far as presiding officers are concerned, about speaking beside the question, superfluously, or tediously, as Jefferson's Manual provides.

I believe it can be properly said that in the American legislative practice there is not allowed the possibility for such a situation as we face here, where legislation can be literally killed by talking it to death.

Mr. DOUGLAS. In view of all that, I should like to ask the Senator from New York what Mr. White should have to say about these southern legislatures, if our mild provision for cloture after from 5 to 8 weeks of debate is indefensible extremism. Are not those rules of the southern senates and the southern lower houses "indefensible extremism?"

Mr. JAVITS. I certainly must say to my colleague that we can always use descriptions, but that facts are the heaviest artillery. When we marshal the facts with respect to the 48 States, the rules of the Senate, which have persisted for so many years and which have frustrated so much legislation, become an anachronism almost intolerable in this modern day.

Mr. DOUGLAS. May I ask the Senator from New York if the Senate of the Confederate States of America provided for moving the previous question?

Mr. JAVITS. Attached to the memorandum I have inserted in the RECORD is a statement dealing with the rules for conducting business in the Senate of the Confederate States of America. I read from that statement:

No motion for the previous question shall be entertained, but upon the call of any Senator for the question, if seconded by a majority of the Senators present, the vote shall immediately be taken on the pending question, whatever it may be, without further debate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. In other words, the principle of the previous question was contained in the rules of the Senate of the Confederate States?

Mr. JAVITS. Let us say, because it expressly says that they do not allow the previous question, that the principle of cloture by majority vote, upon the call of any member, was in effect in the Confederate Senate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That was a complete guillotine. It did not permit 15 days of debate. It did not require the filing of a petition by 16 Senators. It did not require any of the other procedural safeguards to be found in our amendment.

Mr. JAVITS. It did not require a majority of 50 Senators, of those elected and sworn, which is a very strong requirement contained in the Douglas proposal.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is not merely the Douglas proposal. It is the proposal of 16 Senators.

Mr. JAVITS. I am delighted and honored to be a cosponsor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from New York, the Senator from New Jersey, the Senator from Pennsylvania, and other Senators are very valued Members of the group. Therefore I do not wish any unpopularity which the Senator from Illinois may have to be attached to so worthy a measure.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator. While I am on my feet I should like to say that I would appreciate it if the Senator from Illinois would ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point excerpts from the report of the Committee on Rules and Administration on proposed amendments to rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate. It is Report No. 1509, Calendar No. 1534. It contains the full disclosures, together with the considered arguments by the very distinguished and able Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE] and myself on the subject. I believe it would be very useful. I also ask unanimous consent that the individual views of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE] be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the documents were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Rules and Administration, to whom was referred Senate Resolutions 17, 19, 21, 28, 29, 30, 32, and 171, having considered these resolutions report favorably Senate Resolution 17 without amendment and recommend that this resolution be agreed to. Senate Resolution 17 would amend section 2 and would repeal section 3 of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, relating to the procedure to limit debate in the Senate.

S. Res. 17, if adopted by the Senate, would effect the following changes in rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate:

The Senate Committee on Rules and Administration on June 12, 1957, appointed a special subcommittee consisting of Senator HERMAN E. TALMADGE, of George, and Senator JACOB K. JAVITS, of New York, as cochairmen to hold public hearings on and consider proposed amendments to rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate. This subcommittee held extensive hearings on June 17, 24, 25, and 28 and July 2, 9, and 16, 1957.

Other hearings on rule XXII have been held before—in 1947, 1949, 1951—and the Committee on Rules and Administration has recommended amendment in its reports of April 3, 1947, February 17, 1949, March 6, 1952, and May 12, 1953. The issue was also involved in the debate which developed on the unsuccessful motion to adopt rules at the beginning of the 83d and 85th Congresses.

Senator TALMADGE and Senator JAVITS having filed their individual views with the full committee, the committee met on March 26, 1958, and a majority voted to report favorably Senate Resolution 17.

In the opinion of the majority of the committee the United States Senate as a parliamentary body of a constitutional democracy should, in order to fulfill more fully its historic function, provide under its rules of procedure for the two basic functions of all parliamentary bodies: (1) The opportunity to debate fully and adequately all questions which come before it, and (2) the opportunity of a majority of the body to act on issues after proper debate—to act in the only way in which a parliamentary body can act—by voting.

Viewed in somewhat different terms the problem of control of parliamentary debate can be stated as one of protecting minorities—sectional, economic, or of whatever description—against hasty and, at times, unsound action by the majority (often only a temporary majority) and of permitting the majority after reasonable procedural delays to prevail.

The majority of the committee, after carefully considering the conflicts of interest and the complex questions involved in devising a fair and effective rule, have concluded that standing rule XXII in its present form is inadequate and that Senate Resolution 17 would provide a great improvement over the present rule.

Rule XXII as it now reads provides that 2 calendar days after presentation to the Senate of a written motion for cloture signed by 16 Senators, cloture may be imposed by affirmative vote of two-thirds of the Senators "duly chosen and sworn" (i. e., usually 64). If such cloture motion be adopted each Senator is thereafter limited to a total of 1 hour's time in debate on the pending matter. The rule further provides that even this difficult cloture may not be imposed on any motion or resolution to change any of the standing rules of the Senate including rule XXII itself. (This further restriction is, in our opinion, beyond the power of the Senate to adopt, as the advisory opinion of Vice President NIXON, January 4, 1957, concluded.)

Rule XXII prevents the imposition of cloture unless 64 Senators appear and vote in favor of a cloture motion.

It is important to bear in mind that under the present rule a Senator does not have to vote against a cloture motion to help prevent its adoption. If fewer than 64 Senators vote in favor of cloture it is not imposed. All that is needed under the present rules to prevent a limitation on debate is for 33 Senators either to vote against the cloture motion or to fail to be present to vote for it. Absence is made equivalent to a vote against cloture.

The realistic effect of the present rule is that a small minority of Senators (far fewer than 33 as a practical matter), if sufficiently determined, can by use of a filibuster absolutely prevent the Senate from taking action even though a great majority of Senators desires to come to a vote on any particular issue. Voting is the final method of resolution of national issues contemplated in the Constitution. Protracted speaking which is not intended to illuminate that decision but to prevent its occurrence, makes a mockery of freedom of speech by confusing it with freedom to obstruct.

Insofar as rule XXII permits a minority of the Senate to frustrate the majority in reaching a determination of an issue, we think it is contrary to the spirit of the Constitution and to the consensus of the Founding Fathers of our Government and to the early precedents of Senate history.

In the early Senate, the simple majority cloture was used, and the "previous question" as a parliamentary device was available under Senate rules and in Jefferson's Manual to bring an issue to a vote. Even after reference to the "previous question" was dropped from the standing rules (in 1806), the presiding officer's power to rule on questions of relevancy and order could have prevented abuse brought about through unrestrained irrelevancies. The conjunction of the lack of cloture and the lack of enforcement of a rule of relevancy (after 1872) made possible the modern veto-type filibuster.

Subsection 3 of rule XXII deserves separate attention for it is a built-in filibuster device, which, if held valid, makes the whole rule so unjust as to require it to fall of its own weight of unfairness. It is difficult to obtain the affirmative vote of 64 Senators to limit a filibuster on any subject. But when a motion to change rule XXII itself (or for that matter any rule of the Senate) is involved, subsection 3 requires, in effect, unanimous consent. It raises minority control to such a degree that Vice President NIXON found that it is in principle unconstitutional.

Pursuant to the Constitution each House determines its own rules of procedure, and in this context action by each House means a majority of each House. A practical delegation of that power to one Senator or to 33 Senators is beyond the power of this body. Its responsibilities are derived from the Constitution and, short of amending that document, there is no way of qualifying this power.

Senate Resolution 17 provides that debate may be limited by a vote of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting 2 days after 16 Senators have filed a petition for this purpose. It further provides that 15 days, exclusive of Sundays and holidays, after the presentation to the Senate of a petition signed by 16 Senators, the Senate by a majority vote of those "duly chosen and sworn" (49 of the 96 Senators) may also impose cloture. Moreover, it eliminates the exemption to any form of cloture of a motion to change the Senate's standing rules (subsec. 3). As in the present rule, even after cloture is voted each Senator may speak for 1 additional hour before the vote.

In the opinion of the majority of the committee neither freedom of speech nor the right of full debate in the Senate is at issue in this recommendation that Senate Resolution 17 be adopted by the Senate. In advocating a change in rule XXII to permit effective cloture while allowing for full and adequate debate, we seek no abridgement of the liberty of speech, but a just and necessary restraint upon an abuse which hinders or frustrates the performance by the Senate of its constitutional duty and perverts the reasonable function and objective of the spoken word.

The deep responsibility which rests on the Senate in this matter is highlighted by the emergency character of issues facing our country, issues of peace or oblivion, issues in the resolving of which the United States Senate will play a leading role. As our country and our world move forward at this present rapid pace, we cannot continue a procedural roadblock which can paralyze the functioning of the Senate. Important at any time, that fact is of a crucial nature now.

INDIVIDUAL VIEWS OF MR. COOPER

I voted with the majority of the committee to report Senate Resolution 17 to the Senate favorably because I think the issues involved in the problem of Senate cloture should be thoroughly discussed and settled during this session and prior to the beginning of the 1st session of the 86th Congress next January.

Rules XXII as presently worded acts as an effective obstacle, in my opinion, to action by the Senate in the form of a vote on any question on which a small but determined minority desires that the Senate be frustrated. I believe in majority rule, save as our Federal Constitution has placed certain fundamental restraints on such action in behalf of minorities.

I believe that the Senate—that a majority of the Senate except in the cases enumerated in the Constitution—should be permitted ultimately in the course of a deliberation and debate on a great national question to act by voting. I am not sure that Senate Resolution 17 is the best rule that can be devised but on the other hand I am certain that the present rule at times stultifies the Senate as an effective parliamentary body. I would not be opposed to a longer waiting period than that proposed in Senate Resolution 17 before cloture would become effective, to remove any question about adequate debate.

Two things in this issue are important in my opinion: The first is that there should be an opportunity to debate fully all controversial questions. The second is that a majority of the Senate, if it so desires, should be permitted, under the rules that govern this great deliberative body, to reach ultimately a vote on any question before it.

In joining the majority in reporting Senate Resolution 17 favorably, I reserve the right to sponsor or support amendments in the Senate which in my opinion will more effectively achieve the goals of parliamentary procedure outlined above.

INDIVIDUAL VIEWS OF MR. JAVITS

Summary statement

After careful study of the hearing testimony and of the historic conceptions of the function of the Senate, I am convinced that rule XXII needs amendment to end its veto power on behalf of a small minority; while at the same time assuring the opportunity for full debate and discussion of any subject in the Senate, which has been called the greatest deliberative body on earth.

I do not believe that the present rule XXII serves the purpose of deliberation within the Senate or of education of the public generally. No one questions those two objectives. What I do question is a delegation of the power and responsibility of the majority to a determined minority, which has been and can be again and again an arbitrary block to action, contrary to the will of the majority of this body and of the people to whom they are responsible. Indeed, it seems to me prophetic that this report is filed at an hour of basic crisis in the defense of our country when the weapons which challenge us are precisely so mortally dangerous because of the speed with which they may be effectively used to destroy us. In such a time—and there is nothing temporary about this new frame of reference—there is a justifiable demand for making our organs of decision conform to the challenge. How appropriate, then, to consider now a rule of debate which can and has paralyzed decision in the Senate and which can be used by a determined minority to paralyze it on any subject—not alone civil rights. Rule XXII as now written was archaic long before the first Russian earth satellite was launched and is even more so now.

Careful research on the development of the United States Government from its initial period under the Articles of Confederation, through the Constitutional Convention of 1787, when studied in the light of the contemporaneous writings of the Foundling Fathers, convinces me that the power which now stems from rule XXII was not even contemplated at the time. On the contrary, from the expressed views of Madison, Hamilton, and others, a method of parliamentary procedure premised on rule XXII would have been violently opposed had it been suggested.

For the premise of rule XXII violates fundamental parliamentary law. It is at odds with early Senate procedures, British Parliamentary practice, and, almost without exception, is contrary to all our State legislative rules of procedure.

In the early Senate, simple majority cloture was used and the "previous question" as a parliamentary device was available under Senate rules and in "Jefferson's Senate Manual" to close debates. Even after reference to the "previous question" was dropped from the standing rules (in 1806), the presiding officer's power to rule on questions of relevancy and order could have prevented abuse through unrestrained irrelevancies. The conjunction of the lack of cloture and the lack of enforcement of a rule of relevancy (after 1872) made possible the modern veto-type filibuster.

Its fullest development and its most flagrant abuses have occurred following the Civil War in opposition to civil rights legislation—mostly in the last 35 years.

While rule XXII did not prevent enactment of the Civil Rights Act of the last session, I believe it did profoundly affect its final formulation, as I shall set forth in more detail subsequently.

Neither national interest, history, nor commonsense support the retention of the present provisions of the Senate rule, and I recommend it be amended for the reasons set forth in this report.

Present rule—Context of problem

Rule XXII as it now reads provides that 2 calendar days after presentation to the Senate of a written motion for cloture signed by 16 Senators, cloture may be imposed by affirmative vote of two-thirds of the Senators "duly chosen and sworn" (i.e., 64). If such cloture motion be adopted each Senator is thereafter limited to a total of 1 hour's time in debate on the pending matter. The rule further provides that even this difficult cloture may not be imposed on any motion or resolution to change any of the standing rules of the Senate including rule XXII itself. (This further restriction is probably beyond the power of the Senate to adopt, as the advisory opinion of Vice President NIXON, January 4, 1957, concluded.)

Rule XXII prevents the imposition of cloture unless 64 Senators appear and vote in favor of a cloture motion.

It is important to bear in mind that under the present rule a Senator does not have to vote against a cloture motion to help prevent its adoption. If fewer than 64 Senators vote in favor of cloture it is not imposed. All that is needed under the present rules to prevent a limitation on debate is for 33 Senators either to vote against the cloture motion or to fail to be present to vote for it. Absence is made equivalent to a vote against cloture.[1]

The realistic effect of the present rule is that a small minority of Senators (far fewer than 33 as a practical matter), if sufficiently determined, can by use of a filibuster absolutely prevent the Senate from taking action (in the only way it can—by voting) even though a great majority of Senators desire to come to a vote. Voting is the final method of resolution of national issues contemplated in the Constitution. Protracted speaking which is not intended to illuminate that decision, but to prevent its occurrence, makes a mockery of freedom of speech by confusing it with freedom to obstruct. It does not require great imagination to grasp the significance of this potential power in the hands of Members bent on influencing enactment or the course of particular proposals, without the necessity for persuasion.

Issue

The basic issue underlying the problem of cloture is whether we shall permit the Senate, resting as it does on the premise of majority rule, to function at all; to fulfill its legislative purpose; or whether we shall permit the Congress to be stultified by the undemocratic and, in essence, unparliamentary device of filibuster in the Senate—even though cloaked in the senatorial toga of rule XXII.

In analyzing their impact on representative government, I would hazard at least three classifications of filibusters:

1. Those conducted by a very few Senators, sometimes by only one Senator. The speeches may or may not be relevant, but, relevant or not, although they are not utilized to convince, neither can they usually prevent action.

2. Those conducted by a substantial number of Senators and, again, usually not intended to prevent action, but only to delay it, while the people of the country become better acquainted with the issues (either through senatorial exposition or upon independent reflection), and obtain an opportunity to make their views known to their Senators.

3. Those conducted by a substantial minority of Senators organized and intended to prevent Senate action—to stop it absolutely or materially to alter its character, not through Senate persuasion or public awareness, but simply through the filibuster—or even the threat of it, expressed or implied. (These are the stultifying filibusters with which this report is primarily concerned.)

My colleague, Senator DOUGLAS of Illinois, has said that the term "filibuster" should properly be applied only to this stultifying variety. While I think this is accurate, the term has been used to cover all types of speeches where the length of the speech is not reasonably designed for persuasion.

The first two types in any given situation may be a waste of the Senate's time or a great benefit, depending on one's own point of view, in the circumstances; but, at least, neither of them prevents the Senate from seasonably acting, and if immediate action is not vital, these, at worst, are tolerable and at best are an enlargement of the opportunity for full discussion, so characteristic of the Senate.

The power of the filibuster as a veto, with a case history of the civil rights bill of 1957

The ability to carry on a filibuster can affect the kind of legislation passed by the Senate even though no actual filibuster is undertaken. The incidence of a filibuster or the certain knowledge that a filibuster would be organized has made the majority come to terms before. The mere threat that a filibuster of great length would be undertaken against some proposal or unless amendment to a bill was accepted has in effect resulted in the majority of the Senate acquiescing in changes in legislation which otherwise they would probably not have considered wise or desirable.

Careful study of the legislative background and history of the civil rights bill of 1957 and the changes that occurred during the long Senate debate bears out this conclusion and illustrates the pervasive and subtle effect of rule XXII. The bipartisan effort which bypassed the usual procedure of referral of the House bill to committee clearly showed that the majority of Senators were determined to act upon civil rights legislation. It was generally conceded that a reasonable time would be allocated to the discussion of whether the Senate should adopt the procedure of bypassing the committee. No actual filibuster took place at this point—although, clearly, the possibility had to be reckoned with. The vote for direct Senate consideration of the House bill as opposed to committee referral was 45 to 39.

Following this vote, it became apparent that a bloc of Senators had selected part III as the most objectionable feature of the bill from their viewpoint; and that they were prepared to use every parliamentary device to prevent the enactment of a law which would contain the authorization for the Attorney General on his own motion to enforce through civil action (as an alternative to criminal prosecutions in existing law) the provisions of the 14th amendment to the Constitution. I believe that a number of Senators, among whom were some who favored the retention of part III, felt that insistence on part III would inevitably force the Senators from the South into a filibuster, with the ensuing possibility that no bill at all might be passed. That may well have been the case, although personally I believed then, and I believe now, that the risk should have been taken. In my mind it had become clear that the Federal Government had the responsibility of assuring reasonable civil enforcement powers under the 14th amendment; especially since a number of States in the South had passed laws which had the effect of making privately initiated litigation very difficult—the so-called anti-barratry and similar statutes. Thus, I felt that justice and conscience required the issue to be met on principle; and not on the sole ground of procedural difficulties which such a fight would entail. The vote which struck part III was 52 to 38.

The reasons which motivated the Senators to vote against part III undoubtedly were many and varied. Certainly, no one can say for sure that without the threat of organized filibuster, part III would have been retained; but, it is my belief that a critical number of Senators did become convinced of the impossibility—or at least the improbability—of passing a bill with part III, and that their views were necessarily affected by this consideration. It must remain conjectural why part III was lost to the legislation. I have no doubt that if part III had been retained in the bill the Senate would have faced the necessity of a long filibuster which could be blocked only if a large majority were sufficiently determined to sit out the long dreary months that would have been involved. In that interim, no other business could have been transacted and Congress would have been at a standstill. In these times, with important pending legislation, this was a risk to which, naturally, Members of the Senate should give thoughtful consideration. The determined proponents of part III were fully aware of consequences of insisting upon it. Schedules were worked out for around-the-clock coverage of the Senate floor, Members had beds installed in their offices, the staff details were worked out for a 24-hour operation. Senator RUSSELL of Georgia, the leader of the southern bloc of Senators, was interviewed on a nationwide television program, Face the Nation, on July 21, 1957. Pertinent excerpts of the interview transcript inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 22, 1957, indicate clearly the position of the minority:

"Mr. SHADEL. But, Senator, is there any feeling in the Senate that this bill is going to go through, as is, without modifications?

"Senator RUSSELL. Not on my part because I will certainly die fighting it in my tracks before this vicious bill could go through, and I would feel the same way if it were aimed at any section of the country. * * *

* * * * *

"Mr. LAWRENCE. Well, would it be the intention of the South, under the circumstances that I can foresee and that you can foresee at the moment, to talk this bill to death?

"Senator RUSSELL. I can't say that, Mr. Lawrence, without seeing the bill and if it has these very vicious provisions in it, well, you may be sure that we will use every means at our command to fight it to the very death because it is a very vicious piece of legislation in its present form."

Decision by ordeal was imminent.

[1] The average voting attendance on motions to impose cloture in the Senate between the initiation of the rule in 1917 and the 1949 amendment was 84. Two-thirds of those voting would be 56. The 1949 requirement of 64 affirmative votes, therefore, greatly increased the previous difficulty of imposing cloture under the 1917 rule. On the basis of this experience the change meant three-fourths of the Senators "present and voting" would have to favor cloture in order to impose it. The 1949 amendment, therefore, in this respect, was a retrogressional step.

No one who participated in the Senate's deliberations could escape the sense of drama, or the mounting tension and concern over the threat inherent in a filibuster. It was in this atmosphere that crucial decisions were made resulting in a number of changes in the legislation, including the elimination of part III.

There were other amendments to the civil rights bill, although not as vital as part III, which demonstrated the power of the filibuster possibilities inherent in rule XXII to condition and to modify legislation. Even the proponents of a strong civil rights bill joined in amending the bill to grant additional power over commission staff selection to the Senate or remove certain features which were felt most objectionable to the southern Members. These amendments, although they have not yet proved crucial, reflected again the power of the filibuster threat. They included striking out of the specific power of the President to enforce Federal court decrees. As demonstrated by developments in Little Rock, this specific grant of power was unnecessary. The President retained the power as a necessary incident of his Executive responsibility. The appointment of the Executive Director of the Commission was made subject to Senate confirmation, with the practical effect of giving additional authority to the opponents of civil rights who are powerful members of the committee which will initially pass upon his selection. These amendments were approved, among other reasons, to help insure no filibuster.

Once part III had been eliminated and the other concessions given, and even after the Senate had interposed the jury trial requirement in the voting rights provision, it was not at all clear that there would not be a filibuster against the remaining bill. But, ironic as it may seem, at this point rule XXII well may have had an unexpected effect upon the chances for passage of the bill. Rule XXII is the final inner citadel of the opponents of civil rights legislation. It is the last fortress in the legislative arm for a determined minority to prevent altogether or to water down substantially legislation that they violently oppose. As a consequence, there came a point at which the minority had to face the realization that reckless opposition to a very mild civil rights bill would build up tremendous forces for a direct assault on rule XXII itself. Having drawn a number of teeth from the civil rights bill the decision was seemingly made to keep rule XXII as impregnable as possible by permitting the bill to come to a vote.

On the one hand, without question the southern Senators on the civil rights issue had accomplished a great deal, from their point of view. Senator RUSSELL of Georgia summed up this matter for the opposition in retrospect on August 30, 1957, when he said in the Senate:

"When it is considered that there were only 18 out of 96 Senators, all of us suspect because we were from the South, who were willing to wage an all-out fight on this bill, I think that I can, in all modesty, say for myself and my associates that the legislative history of the Senate does not reveal as great a victory from so small a group as the one we attained."

At the same time, Senator RUSSELL admitted that the use of the filibuster was often discussed by the southern bloc, but that it was generally decided to avoid it. This decision was not universally accepted. Senator THURMOND established a record of speaking for over 24 hours—a feat which turned out to be completely unrelated to effective opposition to the final version of the bill. It did, however, serve to emphasize, if it were necessary, that rule XXII contains a coercive power that could not be underestimated. The other southern Members who did not join in a filibuster had apparently weighed its use against graver consequences. My cochairman, Senator TALMADGE, following Senator THURMOND'S recordbreaking stint, stated the dilemma thus (on August 30, 1957):

"Because of the present complexion of the Rules Committee, it is well known that any filibuster attempt would result in the reporting of one or more of these pending resolutions and the imposition of a much stronger cloture rule, which would further limit the ability of individual Senators to protect their constituents."

On August 7 in the Senate, Senator MCNAMARA, of Michigan, stated the case somewhat differently:

"The defenders of segregation have won a great defensive victory which, in the opinion of some of us, will cost our country dearly, internally and in our standing among the nations and peoples of the world.

"The defenders of segregation fought with skill and determination. They were united. They were able to win the support of many who were and, I believe, still are, opposed to the continuance of segregation and first- and second-class citizenship in this country. Why?

"Without attempting to detract from the skill, stamina, and success of those who are opposed to civil-rights legislation, it must be said that their victory was won, not on July 24, when part III was stricken from the House bill by a vote of 52 to 38, nor on August 1 when part IV was largely nullified for Negroes in large areas of the South by the 51-to-42 vote for the so-called jury-trial amendment, but on January 4, 1957. That was when the Senate voted, 55 to 38, to put King Filibuster back on his invisible but very real throne overlooking and dominating this Chamber."

I believe that the Senate will not pass needed civil-rights legislation until rule XXII has been modified so that it no longer holds its effective restraint on this body in the area of enforcing constitutional rights.

In closing on this point, I should like to add that Little Rock has demonstrated that the decision taken by the Senate to eliminate part III was unwise and that the risk of a stubborn filibuster should have been faced in the last session.

Close observers of the legislative process in Congress are aware of this force—of the filibuster—in other legislative compromises which have been adopted, and could cite other examples of the effect of the filibuster on legislation. Vice President Charles G. Dawes, a keen student of Senate proceedings, described the effect of the filibuster in the following words:

"The right of filibuster does not affect simply legislation defeated but, in much greater degree, legislation passed, continually weaving into our laws which should be framed in the public interest alone, modifications dictated by personal and sectional interest as distinguished from the public interest."

It is no answer to say, as some do say, that such power prevents or softens bad legislation. Of course, it may do that; because legislative proposals subject to a successful filibuster do not get enacted. If any specific action is bad, inaction may be preferred. If all change were bad, then whatever inhibited it would be wise. But the millennium is not here and events do not wait, even if governments do. This built-in stalemate as a permanent method of procedure is opposed to our American spirit and genius.

If the men who conceived our Constitution had thought we needed the concurrence of the majority of two Houses, the assent of the President, and in addition the forebearance of 33 Senators to make law, I assume they would have said so. If this additional check on governmental action is necessary, let us amend the Constitution. The standing rules of the Senate were not drafted in Philadelphia in 1787. The American people neither concurred in them nor agreed to be bound by them—nor did the States. In each Congress, as adopted or acquiesced in, and, to the extent they are constitutional, they bind our Senate procedure so long as they remain unchanged, but they are not the supreme law. They are not the bulwark of free speech and States rights; nor are they immutable.

In answer to principal argument favoring rule XXII

In my study I have given close attention to the arguments put forward by many of those opposed to any change in rule XXII and who appeared before our subcommittee. Some of these are superficial and based upon an erroneous conception of our Government. However, there are impressive lines of reasoning employed in defense of the present wording of rule XXII, and much of this, too, was brought out during the hearings. One of the most distinguished arguments in opposition to a change in the rule in my opinion was made by my colleague, Senator STENNIS, of Mississippi. Excerpts from his testimony follow:

"Now, the phrase 'State rights' is often used. I am thinking of this in terms of States powers. We are down to the last nub of representation of States as States. * * *

"It is only in the Senate that the States as such have representation. Their rights and powers are deposited in the Senate Chamber. It is their only forum in Government. It is the only place where their rights and powers, which were not delegated but were reserved under the 9th and 10th amendments, find their protectors.

"If this be true, and it is true, then it must follow that the Senators elected from their States are the trustees of their States rights and powers.

"Members of the Senate had nothing to do with creating these rights and powers. That was accomplished when the Bill of Rights was adopted.

"They have a responsibility, where legislation involves the creation of new Federal power, to see that their States rights are protected. * * *

"They have a duty to go forward in protecting the rights of States which have entrusted them with the power of a senatorial vote.

"On the specific issues which come before the Senate, I feel that the question of support or opposition to any measure should depend not only on the individual Member's opinions on the effect of this legislation at the national level, but should also reflect the searching of his conscience as to whether the power of the State he represents would be effectively diminished in derogation of the constitutional balance and whether, in effect, he is violating the trust placed in him by the people of the State he represents by assenting to a loss of some incident of sovereignty of the State. * * *

"I think that the Government must be kept close to and responsible to the people, and that the effectiveness of local and State governments should not be further diminished by ill-considered and unwise legislation. * * *

"This rule, and the underlying principle of full and free discussion of major national issues, more than any other single thing determines the power of the States in their representation in the Senate. As much as any other single thing, the principle of free discussion without the threat of a gag rule determines the nature of the Senate and contributes to its stability.

"Now there is your Senate as an institution.

"If this rule were eliminated and cloture were made possible by a mere majority vote of the Senate, the deliberative function of the Senate would be destroyed. It would be a mere annex of the House of Representatives, and would be merely another legislative body * * *."

The heart of this argument against amendment is contained in the rhetorical questions (1) whether "the power of the State he [a Senator] represents would be effectively diminished in derogation of the constitutional balance and whether, in effect, he is violating a trust by assenting to a loss of some incident of sovereignty of the State"; (2) whether "the deliberative function of the Senate would be destroyed."

On the first question, one may, of course, argue that the existence of rule XXII by which any substantial group of Senators can conduct a filibuster so as to act as a veto, constitutes a "power" which may be exercised on behalf of the States represented by the filibustering Senators; but it is the power neither of persuasion nor of public education. It is an arbitrary power unsanctioned by the Constitution and indeed in direct conflict with its spirit.

Far from securing any constitutional balance, rule XXII seriously disturbs it. The Constitution, in article I, section 5, clause 1, states that "a majority of each [House] shall constitute a quorum to do business."

That is, 49 Senators are sufficient for the transaction of legislative business. A majority of this quorum is required to assent to the passage of a normal bill. Yet cloture may not be invoked unless at least 64 Members are present and vote for cloture. Legislation of the most profound national effect requires the assent of fewer than half of those required to bring a filibuster to a reasonable close so that that very legislation may be acted upon. I fail to see what balance is here maintained by continuance of the present rule. Alexander Hamilton in arguing, in the Federalist Papers, for the adoption of the Constitution he had helped frame, set forth the need for a totally different balance (Federalist Papers No. 22):

"To give a minority a negative upon the majority (which is always the case where more than a majority is requisite to a decision), is, in its tendency, to subject the sense of the greater number to that of the lesser * * *. This is one of those refinements which, in practice, has an effect the reverse of what is expected from it in theory. The necessity of unanimity in public bodies, or of something approaching toward it, has been founded upon a supposition that it would contribute to security. But its real operation is to embarrass the administration, to destroy the energy of the Government, and to substitute the pleasure, caprice, or artifices of an insignificant, turbulent, or corrupt junto, to the regular deliberations and decisions of a respectable majority * * *. The public business must, in some way or other, go forward. If a pertinacious minority can control the opinion of a majority respecting the best mode of conducting it, the majority, in order that something may be done, must conform to the views of the minority; and thus the sense of the smaller number will overrule that of the greater, and give a tone to the national proceedings. Hence, tedious delays; continual negotiation and intrigue; contemptible compromises of the public good, and yet, in such a system, it is even happy when such compromises can take place: for upon some occasions things will not admit of accommodation; and then the measures of government must be injuriously suspended, or fatally defeated. It is often, by the impracticability of obtaining the concurrence of the necessary number of votes, kept in a state of inaction. Its situation must always savor of weakness, sometimes border upon anarchy * * *.

"When the concurrence of a large number is required by the Constitution to the doing of any national act, we are apt to rest satisfied that all is safe, because nothing improper will be likely to be done; but we forget how much good may be prevented, and how much ill may be produced, by the power of hindering the doing what may be necessary; and of keeping affairs in the same unfavorable posture in which they may happen to stand at particular periods."

To be sure, there are times when more than a majority is required under the Constitution; but even in these instances only two-thirds of those present is required on any vote. Strangely enough it takes more Senators to shut off a filibuster by one Senator than it takes to expel a Member from the Senate.

There was a great question of the proper balance of State representation in the Congress in 1787. A study of the debates of the Constitutional Convention shows very clearly that the decision to establish 2 Houses, one to be based on a reference to population, and the other to have 2 Senators from each State regardless of size or population, was the compromise between the delegates from big States and the delegates from the small States. This was the only basis on which the small States would agree to join the Federal Union. This was the great compromise that gave the small States an equal measure of legislative power with the more populous States in this body.

As far as the big States are concerned, according to Madison and others devoted to the principle of proportional representation, they had given enough and more than enough when they finally agreed that each State should have two votes in the Senate. No one then dreamed that in the future Senators would want to upset this balance and add an additional check by a small minority of one-third upon the power of a majority of the Senate as so constituted. This, of course, was long prior to the time when John C. Calhoun developed his theory of concurrent majorities under which legislation favored by a majority in the country as a whole or in the Congress would be subject to the veto of a majority of each and every sectional interest in the country.

This kind of balance, which the opponents of civil-rights legislation wish to retain in the Senate, is a modern version of Calhoun's "concurrent majorities." It was such a sectional right of veto and interposition that Calhoun and other States-rights advocates urged during the debates, in and out of Congress, that led up to the Civil War. This type of imbalance, however, finds no support in the Constitution nor in current practice outside of rule XXII.[2]

On Senator STENNIS' second point: that to make cloture easier would bring about "gag rule" and destroy the unique characteristic of the Senate—its role as a deliberative body—I wish first to note that I, too, consider the U.S. Senate a great deliberative body and with great pride serve as a Member.

I submit, however, that the Senate is a distinguished body, not because of filibusters or the license to engage in them enjoyed under the present rules, but in spite of them and in spite of the present license to engage in them. No one who has examined some of the filibusters in the Senate would seriously describe them as scenes of great deliberation in keeping with the dignity and prestige of the Senate.

Those who have used the filibuster as an instrument of veto have been under no illusion that they were always thereby contributing to a "full and free discussion" of national issues. Some former Senators have been quite candid about the purpose of the filibuster. In 1922 Senator Underwood of Alabama said, with respect to the filibuster against the Dyer antilynching bill, as follows:

"We are not disguising what is being done on this side of the Chamber. It must be apparent, not only to the Senate but to the country, that an effort is being made to prevent the consideration of a certain bill, and I want to be perfectly candid about it. It is known throughout the country generally as a 'force' bill. * * *

"I do not say that captiously. I think all men here know that under the rules of the Senate when 15 or 20 or 25 men say that you cannot pass a certain bill, it cannot be passed. * * *

"I want to say right now to the Senate that if the majority party insists on this procedure they are not going to pass the bill, and they are not going to do any other business. * * *

"You know you cannot pass it. Then let us go along and attend to the business of the country."

Shortly thereafter he posed the dilemma which the Senate faced even more concisely:

"There is but one way for the Senate now to get down to work and transact the business of the Government before the 4th of March, and that is to get a final disposition of this force bill before anything else is done. Pass it if you can; abandon it if we force you to do so. * * *

"So long as the Senate has the rules that it has now, you know just as well as I know that I am standing here that you cannot pass it; and, more than that, the country does not want you to pass it."

The reality of the use of the filibuster as a veto has been borne out by the experience of the intervening years.

As my colleague, Senator KUCHEL, of California, put it last summer in the hearings before this subcommittee:

"How can any reasonable person uphold such tactics as those which occurred some years ago when the Senate ludicrously debated for 2 weeks a motion to amend the Chaplain's prayer?"

Permitting a Senator or a group of Senators to talk for hours and days on any conceivable subject or on no subject in order to consume time and prevent the Senate from voting, affords no dignity to the Senate and adds nothing to its deliberative function. Reading recipes for "pot licker," fried oysters, quoting from "Aesops Fables,"[3] and otherwise talking in utter irrelevancies does nothing to enhance the Senate's standing as a great deliberative body.

Senators have a right—and freely exercise it—to express their views on any question before the Senate or before the country. Without doubt it would be a violation of the letter and the spirit of the Constitution to deny or even seriously abridge the right of debate. But, it is also a most flagrant violation of the spirit of the Constitution to clothe this body with forms of procedure by which it may be blocked in the exercise of the legislative powers, and thereby suspended of every other function except that of speaking. The Senate has a duty to debate, but it is likewise a constitutional duty of a majority of this body to act, and with some reasonable expedition. We are obligated not only to pass laws, but also to pass them in time to meet the public need and the general welfare of the country.

[2] The paralyzing effect of the minority veto is clearly evident in the deliberations of the United Nations Security Council.

[3] During the filibuster against the extension of a skeletonized NRA, Senator Long discussed various recipes at great length. This talk continued for 15½ hours and included the reading of long passages from works of Victor Hugo and a reading and discussion of the United States Constitution, article by article, without any necessary reference to the pending business. (See vol. 79, pt. 8, pp. 9122 et seq.)

On June 20, 1936, Senator Rush D. Holt of West Virginia successfully filibustered against passage of a coal conservation bill by reading "Aesops Fables" to the Senate. The Senate finally adjourned, sine die, without ever voting on the bill.

Some observers have declared that, far from enhancing the Senate's deliberative function, the right to filibuster has all but destroyed it. Vice President Dawes, for example, said of the veto power of the filibuster:

"The Senate is not and cannot be a properly deliberative body, giving due consideration to the passage of all laws, unless it allots its time for work according to the relative importance of its duties, as do all other great parliamentary bodies. It has, however, through the right of unlimited debate surrendered to the whim and personal purposes of individuals and minorities its right to allot its own time. Only the establishment of majority cloture will enable the Senate to make itself a properly deliberative body. This is impossible when it must sit idly by and see time needed for deliberation frittered away in frivolous and irrelevant talk, indulged in by individuals and minorities for ulterior purposes."

Yet, the Senators who argue that rule XXII should be retained in its present form support this retention as necessary to its deliberative character. I certainly agree that the Senate is a forum of great debate, deliberation, and revision; but I submit that it owes nothing to rule XXII for achieving this distinction. It has achieved that eminence despite the rule.

History of the previous question and cloture

Having considered why the present rule serves neither the constitutional balance of States rights nor the deliberative function of the Senate, it is useful to review the development of cloture and the closely connected motion for the "previous question" in order to evaluate the pending proposals for amendment of rule XXII.

In "Mason's Manual of Legislative Procedure (1953)" the motion is described thus:

"The previous question may be used to close debate on any debatable question * * *. The effect of the motion, if adopted, is to require that the question [before the legislative body] be put to vote immediately. It would be more aptly designated 'vote immediately' * * *."

While the result of passing a motion for the previous question under general parliamentary law is to bring on the main question for immediate vote, the effect of defeating it is to postpone the main question. The almost universal use of the motion in American parliamentary bodies is to bring about cloture.

It was recognized in the early days that a motion for the previous question could close debate in both Houses of the Congress. This is to be expected when one studies the proceedings in the British Parliament, which was the model for our own. The use in that body of the motion for the previous question apparently dates from 1604, and after 1640 it became a prime instrument of cloture.

Its use to end debate and force a vote in the House of Representatives and States' legislatures has been incorrectly called a perversion of the British practice. Fortunately, due to the thorough scholarship of Irving Brant, the eminent biographer of James Madison,[4] we now have an accurate historical review of this motion practice in the British Parliament and in the U.S. Senate. I think it would be helpful to quote from testimony given by him before the special subcommittee. Mr. Brant said:

"As is well known, the U.S. House of Representatives began to limit debate in 1811 by means of the motion for the previous question. It was confronted with persistent filibustering against the 'measures short of war' that preceded the War of 1812.

"The alternatives were to surrender to the minority, or to use the power of the majority to end a purely obstructive debate. The majority acted, not arbitrarily, but after many day-and-night sessions, with the clock running toward a compulsory sine die adjournment.

"The United States Senate had a previous-question rule from 1789 until 1806, when it was dropped. The rule read as follows:

" 'The previous question being moved and seconded, the question from the Chair shall be: "Shall the main question be now put?" And if the nays prevail, the main question shall not then be put.'

"The previous question was moved in the Senate on four occasions. In 1789, the nays won and the subject was postponed. In 1792, the question was worded in reverse. It was moved 'That the question be not now put.' This carried and resulted in postponement. In 1799, the question was moved in the wording required by the rules, 'Shall the main question be now put?' The affirmative won, producing cloture. The main question was then put, and it also carried.

"On the fourth and last occasion, in 1804, the previous question was moved during the impeachment trial of Judge Pickering. The complicated details of this controversy are set forth in my memorandum on the previous question, and may be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 103, part 5, page 6684. Instead of summarizing them here, I shall merely quote two sentences from the diary of Senator John Quincy Adams concerning these proceedings:

" 'On this resolution it was not without the utmost difficulty that any discussion whatsoever could be obtained.'

"Again:

" 'The next struggle was to prevent all debate upon the resolution.'

"The majority actually did cut off the debate and proceeded at once to defeat the resolution.

"Looking into British treatises on parliamentary practice, I found the previous question described as a method of postponement in which the mover voted against his own motion. But if the motion should happen to carry, the effect would be to cut off debate and force an immediate vote on the main question.

"I therefore examined the Journals of the House of Commons from 1604 down to the present time and found a truly remarkable record. In the 20th century, the previous question has been moved only twice in the House of Commons, and not once since 1911. In the 17th century, it was moved 736 times. It resulted in cloture 491 times and in postponement 235 times.[5]

"Now, it may be asked, why was it that when the House of Commons came to establish a cloture rule, it didn't simply utilize the previous question for that purpose? Well, that is what it did. On February 25, 1881, a year and a half before the word 'cloture' was applied to the practice, the wording of the motion for the previous question was employed for the avowed purpose—a purpose set forth in the Journals—of stopping debate, and the motion is recorded in the index as a motion for the previous question.

"A year later, the House incorporated some special provisions and changed the name to 'cloture.' Thus we have before us, not an American perversion of the British motion, but a kindred line of development in both countries.

"To this, let me add one more fact. Before the House of Commons converted the motion for the previous question into a cloture rule, it had been dealing with obstructive debate for some years by treating it as contempt of the House, punishable by suspension. That was done under parliamentary practices dating back to 1604, which gave the Speaker power to stop 'superfluous motions, and tedious or impertinent speeches.'

"These same rules were incorporated in Jefferson's 'Manual,' as a guide to Senate conduct, at a time when the Vice President had unappealable power to decide points of order. Here is evidence, then, that if the question of altering the rules of the Senate comes before that body under the general rules of parliamentary practice, it will make no difference whether those general rules are looked for in the pactices of our 48 State legislatures or in the British House of Commons.

"The question of cloture in the Senate must be considered in relation to the nature of that body. The Senate can control the filibuster, it can free itself from the will of a rampaging minority, without the slightest danger of acquiring the ills that afflict the House of Representatives [Mr. Brant has reference to the large membership of the House] and without any possibility of moving into the discipline that marks the [still larger] House of Commons."

Various theories have been advanced to explain why the practice of filibustering as a power of veto developed much more slowly in the Senate than in the House. In fact it was largely brought under control in the House long before it reached the peak of its development in the Senate. One of the reasons that it has been difficult to discover with certainty the history of the early period is that during its first 5 years the Senate sat in secret behind closed doors and only occasionally published extracts from the journal of its proceedings. What knowledge we have of this period has been gained almost entirely from diaries, letters, and other documents written during the period. Furthermore, neither House published verbatim accounts of its proceedings until 1873 and therefore the evidence for some of the early periods is rather meager. In spite of the research difficulties, certain facts have clearly emerged.

The motion for the previous question was from the beginning available in both Houses to close debate and bring an issue to a vote. All that was required was a majority vote. In both Houses the motion for the previous question was itself originally open to debate but not, as some have contended, "without let or hindrance." Certainly, in the early Senate the presiding officer could, pursuant to Jefferson's Manual, rule a Senator out of order for speaking "impertinently or beside [4] Mr. Brant, a former newspaper editor and editorial writer, has been engaged for many years in historical research and writing. Five volumes of his "Life of James Madison" have been published.

Henry Steele Commager, professor of history at Columbia University and Amherst College, describing Mr. Brant's scholarship, said:

"Brant's Madison, which has now reached five volumes, is, by universal agreement of American historians, one of the most impressive achievements of American historical writing of our generation. Thorough, critical, judicious, comprehensive, well-written, it has the quality that so few biographies have, of doing the job so completely and so well that it does not have to be done over. What is perhaps most impressive about Brant's work is that it is based entirely on original research, that it takes nothing for granted but goes to the sources, that it maintains the very highest standards of rigid scholarship. Whatever may be said of Brant's interpretations—and there will always be differences of interpretation—this can be said with confidence, that Brant's historical scholarship is impeccable and unimpeachable."

[5] In a supplementary letter to me, dated December 21, 1957, Mr. Brant made an exhaustive historical analysis of the prevalent misconception that the "previous question" was used primarily in the British House of Commons for the purpose of postponement, showing clearly that the motion was in fact primarily used for cloture.

the question, superfluously, or tediously."[6] In other words, the Senate originally had the motion for the previous question, supplemented by the unappealable authority of the Vice President to rule on questions of order, to prevent a filibuster. When necessary, a majority in the early Senate could, with the cooperation of the Vice President, end filibustering tactics and act on legislation.

Thus the early Senate (from 1789 to 1806) had at its disposal the motion for the previous question supplemented by the Vice President's unappealable authority to stop a Senator in debate for using speech as a dilatory device. The previous question motion, used apparently only four times, was omitted from the rules when they were given a general revision at the beginning of a session in 1806. The deletion occurred without any recorded comment or debate. The reason for dropping this motion from the amended rules in 1806 may well have been that it was not needed to control obstructive speech, which was little used. Also order remained subject to control through the unappealable rulings of the Chair on relevancy and obstruction. The technique of the filibuster as a powerful weapon of obstructing and defeating the majority will in the Senate was still in the future.

Until 1828, the unappealable authority of the Vice President to rule on questions of order remained unchanged. This power to prevent filibusters was supported by the long previous tradition of Senate dignity which frowned on tedious and impertinent speech.[7]

[6] Both John Adams and Thomas Jefferson were forceful presiding officers during their service as Vice President. It is apparent that they maintained the dignity and decorum of debate in the Senate by vigorous application of the rules.

In section XVII of Jefferson's Manual of Parliamentary Practice, Jefferson stated the guiding rule to be: "No one is to speak impertinently or beside the question, superfluously, or tediously," citing precedents from the British Parliament.

In the preface to his manual written while he was serving as Vice President (1797 to 1801), Jefferson said:

"The Constitution of the United States, establishing a legislature for the Union under certain forms, authorizes each branch of it 'to determine the rules of its own proceedings.' The Senate has accordingly formed some rules for its own government but these going only to few cases, it has referred to the decision of its President, without debate and without appeal, all questions of order arising either under its own rules or where it has provided none. This places under the discretion of the President a very extensive field of decision and one which, irregularly exercised, would have a powerful effect on the proceedings and determinations of the House. * * *

"Considering, therefore, the law of proceedings in the Senate as composed of the precepts of the Constitution, the regulations of the Senate, and, where these are silent, of the rules of Parliament, I have here endeavored to collect and digest so much of these as is called for in ordinary practice, collating the parliamentary with the senatorial rules, both where they agree and where they vary."

[7] From the records of the debate in February 1828 concerning the powers of the Vice President to rule on points of order, two propositions emerge:

(1) In the opinion of the presiding officers of the Senate after Jefferson they had the authority to rule a Senator out of order for irrelevant speech and they generally considered Jefferson's Manual controlling on the point; and

In the House of Representatives, protracted speech, while used to some extent in a mild form prior to 1800, did not become an obvious instrument for obstruction until developed by the erratic genius, John Randolph of Virginia, between 1806 and 1811. After extreme provocation by Randolph and others acting with him, the House in desperation, on February 27, 1811, by a vote of 66 to 13 reversed its previous position and decided that a majority vote in favor of a motion for the previous question closed debate on the pending issue. The written rules of the House were thereafter amended on December 21, 1811, to conform to this decision.

In December 1825, John Randolph was elected to fill an unexpired Senate term. He came over to the Senate from the House bringing with him his penchant for irrelevant and lengthy speeches. John C. Calhoun, then Vice President, refused to maintain the same rigid discipline over debate that most of his predecessors had done.

As a result of Calhoun's failure to control irrelevant and tedious debate, the Senate amended the rule to provide explicitly that the Vice President had this authority on his own initiative and made his rulings subject to appeal. In making the Vice President's rulings appealable the Senate did not intend to weaken Senate discipline but rather, in all probability, to strengthen it by adding the weight of the majority to the decision on questions of order when an appeal was taken.

This change in the rules in 1828 apparently restored to the Senate discipline which had been temporarily lost, and the question of controlling debate in this body was not again a subject of major discussion until 1841. This fact suggests the vigor with which presiding officers after 1828 enforced the rules to prevent obstructive delays. In 1841 during an extra session of Congress called by President Harrison to consider the Government's fiscal policy and the rechartering of the national bank, Henry Clay, the Whig leader in the Senate, threatened the minority with bringing forward some form of cloture rule. The records of this session indicate that while debate was extended no real filibuster took place and probably for this reason no such rule was adopted. At this time the rule of relevancy was still available, and as late as the year 1848 the Senate voted (27 to 2) to require a Senator to take his seat for being out of order because of irrelevancy.

But by 1872, when Vice President Schuyler Colfax ruled that under the practice of the Senate the presiding officer could not restrain a Senator in remarks which the Senator considers pertinent to the pending issue, the Senate abandoned its effective control over debate.

From 1872 to 1917, there was neither any cloture rule nor any enforced rule of relevancy. It was during this period that the filibuster matured more or less into its present form.

The first formalized modern cloture rule was not adopted until March 8, 1917. From 1917 until 1949 rule XXII provided that limitation of debate could only be imposed by two-thirds of those Senators voting. In 1949 this percentage was increased to require two-thirds of the entire membership of the Senate to be present and affirmatively voting to end debate. The 1949 revision also amended the rule to subject any measure, motion, or other matter, or the unfinished business, to cloture control. By such change the Senate was no longer bound by former decisions which had held, in brief, that limitation on debate could be had only on a pending measure. The 1949 revision thus eliminated correction of the Journal and presentation of credentials, both highly privileged matters, as well as motions to take up new business, as possible sources of filibusters. It also added subsection 3 to rule XXII, which provides in effect that debate could not be limited on any proposal to amend the Standing Rules of the Senate. (See appendix A, p. 27.)

(2) The tradition of the Senate for dignity in debate down through 1828 at least was a heavy deterrent against filibustering.

Since 1917, 22 votes have been had under rule XXII. On only four occasions was such cloture invoked. Had the 1949 version of the rule been in effect during this time it would have been successful only three times.[8]

Such a self-imposed obstacle to legislation is rare in the history of parliamentary development. All but 12 States of the Union expressly permit the motion for the previous question to close debate in their upper legislative chambers; 4 of these 12 States have another form of cloture rule. Apparently, only in the senate in Utah and Vermont is the use of the previous question specifically prohibited. It is ironical that many of the Senators most opposed to a reasonable limitation on filibusters have the most effective rules for limiting debate in the upper chambers of their own State legislatures. (A tabulation referring to the rules of State senates is set forth in appendix B to this report (p. 27).)

The British Parliament accepts a specialized form of the previous question as a cloture rule and even the Senate of the Confederate States of America in 1862 provided for the previous question as a method of cloture.

Subsection 3 of rule XXII

Subsection 3 deserves separate attention for it is a built-in filibuster device which, if held valid, makes the whole rule so unjust as to require it to fall of its own weight of unfairness. Difficult as it is to obtain the affirmative vote of 64 Senators to limit a filibuster on the usual subjects, on a motion to change rule XXII itself (or for that matter any rule of the Senate), because of this provision unanimous consent is required—short of forcing physical exhaustion. It raises minority control to such a degree that the Vice President found it offended the Constitution.

In an advisory opinion the Vice President on January 4, 1957, held in part as follows:

"The Constitution also provides that 'each House may determine the rules of its proceedings.' This constitutional right is lodged in the membership of the Senate and it may be exercised by a majority of the Senate at any time. When the membership of the Senate changes, as it does upon the election of each Congress, it is the Chair's opinion that there can be no question that the majority of the new existing membership of the Senate, under the Constitution, have the power to determine the rules under which the Senate will proceed.

"Any provision of Senate rules adopted in a previous Congress which has the expressed or practical effect of denying the majority of the Senate in a new Congress the right to adopt the rules under which it desires to proceed is, in the opinion of the Chair, unconstitutional. It is also the opinion of the Chair that section 3 of rule XXII in practice has such an effect."

Pursuant to the Constitution each House determines its own rules of procedure, and in this context action by each House means

[8] Under the 1917 requirement of two-thirds of those voting the motion for cloture succeeded four times:

	Vote
(1) 1919—Treaty of Versailles	78 to 16
(2) 1926—World Court	68 to 26
(3) 1927—Branch banking	65 to 18
(4) 1927—Bureau of Customs and Bureau of Prohibition	55 to 27

Under the present rule requiring 64 affirmative votes the last cloture motion would have failed by 9 votes.

a majority of each House. A practical delegation of that power to 1 Senator or to 33 Senators is beyond the power of this body. Its responsibilities are derived from the Constitution and, short of amending that document, there is no way of qualifying this power.

The Supreme Court has held that a House of Congress "may not by its rules ignore constitutional restraints" (U.S. v. Ballin, 144 U.S. 1, 5).

To illustrate, assume that the Congress passes a statute which by its terms provides that it may not be amended except by unanimous consent of both Houses. Surely no one would thereafter contend that that law might not be amended by a simple majority vote. In other words, Congress cannot impose such a limitation on itself or on future Congresses which is not imposed by the Constitution. In Newton v. Board of County Commissioners (100 U.S. 548), the Supreme Court has held in reference to legislation:

"Every succeeding legislature possesses the same jurisdiction and power with respect to them as its predecessors. The latter have the same power of repeal and modification which the former had of enactment, neither more nor less. All occupy, in this respect, a footing of perfect equality. This must necessarily be so in the nature of things. It is vital to the public welfare that each one should be able at all times to do whatever the varying circumstances and present exigencies touching the subject involved may require. A different result would be fraught with evil."

As a question of power a majority of a quorum of this body may at any time abolish its rules or change its rules. Whatever the rules may say they can be changed by the same power that adopted them. As a matter of power this is necessarily so. That it exists is shown by the fact that on the two most recent occasions efforts to change the rules (1953 and 1957) were defeated by motions to lay on the table, both decided by a majority vote. Of course, Senators may choose to be bound by any restrictions which they care to follow.

I recognize that the problem cannot be solved on the basis of constitutional power alone but must be worked out within both the parliamentary law and the traditions of this body. I am convinced that this can be done, but I think it is important to set at rest any possible question of power to change the rules. The restriction attempted in practical effect in subsection 3 is unconstitutional precisely because it seeks to limit the power granted by the Constitution inherent in the Senate and the responsibility that goes with it.

If subsection 3 is unconstitutional, the method of so deciding, according to the opinion of the Vice President, would be by determination of the Senate itself. Obviously this determination would be by a majority vote. Assuming that it is unconstitutional and therefore of no effect, then it follows that on any motion to change the rules under which the Senate is operating the present cloture provisions of rule XXII, inadequate as they are, nevertheless are available for closing debate which is simply and obviously a filibuster against any proposed change in that rule.

Pending proposals

A number of resolutions proposing amendments to rule XXII were introduced during the 1st session of the 85th Congress. They are before the special subcommittee, and may be summarized as follows:

Senate Resolution 17 provides that debate may be limited by a vote of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting 2 days after 16 Senators have filed a petition for this purpose. It further provides that 15 days, exclusive of Sundays and holidays, after the presentation to the Senate of a petition signed by 16 Senators, the Senate by a majority vote of those "duly chosen and sworn" (49 of the 96 Senators) may also impose cloture. Moreover, it eliminates the exemption to any form of cloture of a motion to change the Senate's standing rules (subsec. 3). As in the present rule, even after cloture is voted each Senator may speak for 1 additional hour before the vote.

Senator Resolution 19 would amend rule XXII by providing that cloture may be imposed by a favorable vote of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting, but in no case less than a majority of Senators "duly chosen and sworn."

Senate Resolution 21 would provide for cloture by a majority of Senators voting (if a quorum be present). It would also permit any Senator to yield to another Senator all or part of the 1 hour time for debate allotted to him after cloture is imposed. This resolution also eliminates subsection 3.

Senate Resolution 28 would make cloture subject to an affirmative vote of a majority of the authorized membership of the Senate (49 Senators) after a waiting period of 12 calendar days (excluding Sundays and legal holidays) following the filing of a written motion for cloture signed by 16 Senators. It would also delete subsection 3.

Senate Resolution 29 would simply declare subsection 3 of the rule unconstitutional.

Senate Resolution 30 permits cloture by a vote of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting and eliminates the exception contained in subsection 3. But, in addition, Senate Resolution 30 provides that the Standing Rules of the Senate would continue from one Congress to the next unless duly changed. This last provision attempts to resolve a question of great complexity which is outside the immediate substantive concern with cloture, although being intimately connected with past and future attempts to deal with the problem.

Senate Resolution 32 would provide a waiting period of 5 days (exclusive of Sundays and legal holidays) in lieu of 2 days under the present rule and would then permit two-thirds of the Senators present and voting to impose cloture. Senate Resolution 32 would also delete subsection 3.

Senate Resolution 171 would allow two-thirds of the Senators present and voting to bring about cloture in lieu of the present rule.

These eight resolutions, even with very considerable differences, have one characteristic in common. They all would make the imposition of cloture easier. Senate Resolution 29 does not do this directly, but does ease the way to change the rule in order to do it.

As I have previously pointed out, since 1917, when the first standing rule on cloture was adopted, there have been 22 votes on motions to impose cloture, but only 4 have been successful. Merely changing a constitutional two-thirds to two-thirds of those voting would have had no effect on the historical results—only four would still have won. By requiring a constitutional majority, a significant difference occurs; nine attempts would have been successful. If only a simple majority had been required, the motion would have carried 15 times.

I do not believe the simple change to a two-thirds voting requirement of Senate Resolutions Nos. 19, 30, 32, and 171 makes significant enough change. I believe the simple majority rule of Senate Resolution 21 is too great a departure to reasonably expect this body to undertake. A table showing the effect of each resolution on past cloture votes follows:

The success of the various proposals if applied to rule XXII cloture votes since 1917

Senate Resolution 17: 9 out of 22 (constitutional majority).

Senate Resolution 19: 4 out of 22 (two-thirds voting).

Senate Resolution 21: 15 out of 22 (majority voting).

Senate Resolution 28: 9 out of 22 (constitutional majority).

Senate Resolution 29: (Only effect is to eliminate subsec. 3 from rule XXII).

Senate Resolution 30: 4 out of 22 (two-thirds voting).

Senate Resolution 32: 4 out of 22 (two-thirds voting).

Senate Resolution 171: 4 out of 22 (two-thirds voting).

On balance, I recommend approval of Senate Resolution 17 as being both moderate and effective. I believe it will enhance the dignity of this body.

As a practical matter we know from the history of the Senate that 16 or more signatures cannot be secured on any cloture petition unless the debate has already become a filibuster.

Conclusion

I am a new Member of the Senate and cannot pretend to be an expert in its procedures and traditions, but I have had considerable parliamentary experience in my public life and I have studied constitutional history and the development of Senate procedures to the best of my ability. In addition, I have had the unique opportunity of serving in the Senate at the time of enactment of the first significant civil rights legislation since that enacted immediately following the Civil War.

I respectfully emphasize to the full Committee on Rules and Administration in its deliberations of suggested amendments to rule XXII that neither freedom of speech nor the right of full debate in the Senate is at issue. In advocating a change in rule XXII to permit effective cloture while allowing for full and adequate debate, I seek no abridgement of the liberty of speech, but a just and necessary restraint upon an abuse which hinders or frustrates the performance by the Senate of its constitutional duty and perverts the reasonable function and objective of the spoken word.

The deep responsibility which rests on the Committee on Rules and Administration in this matter is highlighted by the emergency character of issues facing our country, issues of peace or oblivion, issues which the U.S. Senate will play a leading role in resolving. As our country and our world move forward at this rapid pace, we cannot permit a procedural roadblock that can paralyze the functioning of the Senate. Important at any time, that fact is of a crucial nature now. I deem it our committee's duty to report to the floor of the Senate a recommendation to eliminate that roadblock.

I submit that Senate Resolution 17 would work a reasonable and necessary change in the rule against filibusters and I recommend that the committee report it favorably to the Senate as soon as possible.

JACOB K. JAVITS.

"RULE XXII, STANDING RULES OF THE SENATE

"(As presently existing with the italic designating the change from the 1917 rule)

"2. Notwithstanding the provisions of rule III or rule VI or any other rule of the Senate, except subsection 3 of rule XXII, at any time a motion signed by 16 Senators, to bring to a close the debate upon any measure, motion or other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, is presented to the Senate, the Presiding Officer shall at once state the motion to the Senate, and 1 hour after the Senate meets on the following calendar day but one, he shall lay the motion before the Senate and direct that the Secretary call the roll, and, upon the ascertainment that a quorum is present, the Presiding Officer shall, without debate, submit to the Senate by a yea-and-nay vote the question:

"'Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate shall be brought to a close?'

"And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by two-thirds of the Senators duly chosen and sworn, then said measure, motion, or other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, shall be the unfinished business to the exclusion of all other business until disposed of.

"Thereafter no Senator shall be entitled to speak in all more than 1 hour on the measure, motion, or other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, the amendments thereto, and motions affecting the same, and it shall be the duty of the Presiding Officer to keep the time of each Senator who speaks. Except by unanimous consent, no amendment shall be in order after the vote to bring the debate to a close, unless the same has been presented and read prior to that time. No dilatory motion, or dilatory amendment, or amendment not germane shall be in order. Points of order, including questions of relevancy, and appeals from the decision of the Presiding Officer, shall be decided without debate.

"3. The provisions of the last paragraph of rule VIII (prohibiting debate on motions made before 2 o'clock) and of subsection 2 of this rule shall not apply to any motion to proceed to the consideration of any motion, resolution, or proposal to change any of the Standing Rules of the Senate.

"APPENDIX B

"LIMITATION OF DEBATE IN STATE SENATES

"1. Alabama (1951): Debate may be limited by a vote of two-thirds of all the elected members upon a motion to that effect offered by the committee on rules (rule 19). No member shall speak more than twice on any question under debate, and none shall, without leave of the Senate, consume more than 1 hour each time (rule 37).

"2. Arizona (1951): Previous question authorized (rule XVIII). Presumably requires majority vote. 'Jefferson's Manual' governs when not inconsistent (rule XXIX).

"3. Arkansas (1951): Previous question authorized if seconded by at least five members (rule XV). Presumably required majority vote. Dilatory motions forbidden (rule XIV, sec. 19).

"4. California (1951): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 41).

"5. Colorado (1951): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule IX, subdivision 2). Debate may be limited not less than 1 hour after adoption of motion to that effect by majority vote (rule IX, 3).

"6. Connecticut (1951): No previous question allowed (rulings, p. 39). No member may, without leave, speak more than twice on same question (rule 11). Remarks must be germane (rulings, p. 44).

"7. Delaware (1951): 'Robert's Rules of Order, Revised,' to settle all parliamentary procedure (rule 38).

"8. Florida (1951): A senator may not speak longer than 30 minutes nor more than twice on any one question without leave of the senate (rule 20). 'Jefferson's Manual' governs whenever applicable and not inconsistent with standing rules (rule 77).

"9. Georgia (1957): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 58). All individual speeches on bills and resolutions shall be limited to 30 minutes unless by leave of the senate (rule 15). The president of the senate 'shall in his discretion suspend irrelevant debate and command silence whenever he may deem it needful' (rule 1).

"10. Idaho (1947): Previous question authorized (rule 4), presumably by majority vote. General rules of parliamentary practice to govern in all cases not provided for (rule 23).

"11. Illinois (1951): Previous question authorized (rule 54). No senator may speak more than 15 minutes at any one time without the consent of the senate (rule 33). 'Robert's Rules of Order' govern provided not inconsistent (rule 72).

"12. Indiana (1949): Previous question authorized (rule 17), presumably by majority vote. 'Jefferson's Manual' applies to all points not covered (rule 52).

"13. Iowa (1951): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 20). 'Robert's Rules of Order' govern where not inconsistent (rule 42).

"14. Kansas (1949): Previous question authorized (rule 27), apparently by majority vote (rule 20). No senator may speak more than twice on the same day on the same subject without leave of the senate (rule 7). 'Robert's Rules of Order' apply whenever senate rules do not apply (rule 76).

"15. Kentucky (1954): Previous question authorized by majority of senators voting (sec. 50).

"16. Louisiana (1948): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 17). Debate may be limited by majority vote so that no senator shall speak longer than 1 hour at one time without leave (rule 9).

"17. Maine (1957): No rule on limitation of debate but Reed's Rules and Cushing's Law and Practice to govern whenever applicable and not inconsistent with standing rules (rule 37).

"18. Maryland (1950): Jefferson's Manual to govern when not inconsistent with standing rules (rule 92).

"19. Massachusetts (1956): Debate may be closed not less than 1 hour after adoption of motion to that effect (rule 47), presumably by majority vote. Cushing's Manual shall govern when not inconsistent with standing rules (rule 62).

"20. Michigan (1951–52): Previous question authorized by majority vote of the senators present and voting (rule 65).

"21. Minnesota (1955): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 24). Jefferson's Manual to govern when not inconsistent with standing rules (rule 51).

"22. Mississippi (1948–52): Previous question authorized (rule 65), presumably by majority vote since Rules of United States House of Representatives govern on all questions not in conflict with rules (rule 59).

"23. Missouri (1951): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 76).

"24. Montana (1951): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule XIV). No senator shall speak more than twice in any one debate on the same day and at the same stage of the bill in exclusion of those who have not spoken (rule XII, 4).

"25. Nebraska (1950): Previous question authorized by majority of elected members (rule 10, sec. 9). Gregg's Handbook shall govern when not inconsistent (rule 1). No member shall speak more than twice upon any one question during one legislative day (rule 4, sec. 10). Each day shall be considered a legislative day unless majority votes otherwise (rule 7, sec. 6).

"26. Nevada (1951): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 18). 'Mason's Manual' shall govern (rule 55).

"27. New Hampshire (1951): Previous question authorized (rule 9) presumably by majority vote. No member shall speak more than twice on same question on same day without leave (rule 4).

"28. New Jersey (1951): No senator shall speak more than three times 'on any subject of debate' without the leave of the senate (rule 47).

"29. New Mexico (1951–52): Previous question authorized on demand of majority of members present (rule 54). 'Robert's Rules of Order' to govern in all cases not inconsistent with standing rules (rule 74).

"30. New York (1951): Debate may be limited by majority vote wherever any bill, resolution, or motion shall have been under consideration for 2 hours (rule XIV, sec. 3).

"31. North Carolina (1951): Previous question authorized (rule 57), presumably by majority vote (rule 63).

"32. North Dakota (1951): Previous question authorized (rules 18, 21), presumably by majority vote. Ordinary member may speak only 10 minutes on same subject, then 5 minutes, until every other member choosing to speak shall have spoken, without unanimous consent (rule 13). Robert's Rules to govern when applicable and not inconsistent (rule 77).

"33. Ohio (1951): Previous question authorized on demand of three senators (rule 89), presumably by majority vote. No senator shall speak more than twice on the same question except by leave (rule 74) and may read relevant matter 'of reasonable length' (rule 75). Any recognized standard authority on parliamentary procedure may be received as authority for all cases not provided for (rule 117).

"34. Oklahoma (1951): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 39). No senator shall speak more than 20 minutes on any question without the unanimous consent of the senate, and only 10 minutes during debate in considering bills on general order (rule 107).

"35. Oregon (1951): Previous question authorized (rule 38) by majority vote (rule 69). No member shall speak more than twice on any question without leave (rule 25). After 50th day of session, member may not speak longer than minutes but may yield his time (rule 26). Robert's Rules of Order, Revised, to govern.

36. Pennsylvania (1951–52): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 41). 'Jefferson's Manual' to govern whenever applicable (rule 34).

"37. Rhode Island (1951): Previous question authorized (rule 21). Debate may be closed on motion (presumably by majority vote) after any matter shall have been considered for 2 hours (rule 23).

"38. South Carolina (1951): Debate may be limited by two-thirds of the senate (rule 14). No senator may speak more than 2 hourse in any 1 legislative day on any one bill or resolution (rule 8).

"39. South Dakota (1951): Motion for previous question authorized but must be seconded by one-seventh of the members elected and approved by a majority of those present (rule 53).

"40. Tennessee (1949): Previous question authorized by vote of two-thirds of members present: if rejected, committee of rules may, upon demand of a majority of the members of the senate, submit rule fixing of limiting time for debate for adoption by majority of senate (rule 20).

"41. Texas (1949): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 101).

"42. Utah (1945): Previous question specifically forbidden (rule 45). No senator shall speak more than twice in any one debate on the same day, and at the same stage of the bill without leave (rule 42). 'Robert's Rules of Order' govern whenever applicable, and not inconsistent with senate rules.

"43. Vermont (1950): Previous question forbidden (rule VIII, 55). No senator shall speak more than twice to same question without leave (rule X, 65). 'Robert's Rules of Order' shall prevail (rule XII, 82) on parliamentary questions not covered by the rules.

"44. Virginia (1950): Previous question authorized if seconded by majority of senators present (rule 50), presumably by majority vote. 'Jefferson's Manual' to be used to construe rules (rule 68).

"45. Washington (1951): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 30).

"46. West Virginia (1951): Previous question authorized by majority vote (rule 53).

"47. Wisconsin (1949): Previous question authorized by majority vote ('Manual,' p. 40) on demand of six senators (82).

"48. Wyoming (reprinted 1951): Previous question authorized when seconded by three members and approved by majority vote (pp. 19, 20).

"GENERAL PARLIAMENTARY MANUALS ON PREVENTION OF OBSTRUCTIVE TACTICS

"'Robert's Rules of Order, Revised (1943)': Debate may be closed by a two-thirds vote of the assembly or by adopting the motion for the previous question which requires a two-thirds vote of those present and voting (sec. 44). No dilatory, absurd, or frivolous motions are allowed (sec. 40). 'Whenever the Chair is satisfied that members are using parliamentary forms to obstruct business he should either not recognize them or else rule them out of order' (sec. 40).

"'Jefferson's Manual (1797)': 'No one is to speak impertinently or beside the question, superfluously or tediously' (sec. XVII). No man may speak more than once on the same bill except to clear up a matter of fact or to explain a material part of his speech (sec. XVII). Previous question authorized by majority vote (secs. XXXIV, XLI)."

INDIVIDUAL VIEWS OF MR. TALMADGE

Any proposal for further limiting debate in the U.S. Senate is a matter of grave consequence which, by its very nature, demands that it not be acted upon capriciously or without the benefit of thorough study and full consideration of all its ramifications.

It is out of that deep conviction that I insisted upon comprehensive hearings on the eight resolutions which sought that end, that I have given long and careful study to the transcript of testimony taken at those hearings and to all related materials, and that I herewith set forth in the most earnest terms at my command the compelling reasons why Senate rule XXII must be upheld as written.

Although the question of cloture has been a recurring issue before the Senate since 1917 and hearings previously were held on the subject in 1947, 1949, and 1951, it was not until 1957 that any effort was made to determine the thinking and wishes of the American people on this issue so fundamental to the protection and preservation of their constitutional freedoms.

At my urging a Special Rules Subcommittee composed of Senator JACOB K. JAVITS, of New York, and myself held extensive hearings during last June and July and heard, either in person or by prepared statement, from 132 Senators, spokesmen for organizations with national memberships, and other knowledgeable individuals. While previous hearings had been confined largely to testimony from Senators and paid spokesmen for partisan pressure groups, the 1957 hearings heard from such well-known and respected organizations as the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the Sons and Daughters of the American Revolution.

As the result of the labors of the subcommittee a printed transcript of 364 pages—which unquestionably is the most comprehensive document of its kind ever assembled—now is a matter of official record and, for the first time, Senators have as a basis for informed action on this subject a presentation which encompasses the grassroots sentiments of their constituents.

It must be recognized that the Senate of the United States, as an instrumentality of the States and their citizens, is the property of every American and does not belong to the individuals who transiently occupy the seats in its Chamber. Individual Senators have no proprietary rights in the operation of the Senate except as they act as creatures of the will of the States and constituents they represent.

Therefore, it is certain that no Senator honestly seeking to be responsive to the will of those he serves will wish to close his mind on this issue before giving careful study and consideration to the transcript compiled by this special subcommittee and the unmistakable conclusions of public opinion it affords.

An analysis of that transcript discloses that more than three-fourths of those presenting their views to the subcommittee expressed approval of Senate rule XXII as it now stands and confidence in it as the major bulwark of the people in the maintenance of constitutional government and individual liberty in this Nation.

Further analysis makes plainly evident the fact that those favoring a further erosion of freedom of speech on the floor of the U.S. Senate could offer no sounder reason for their position than their desire to see enacted into law force legislation of the character which was resoundingly defeated by the 1st session of the 85th Congress.

Those who predicated their support of changes in Senate rule XXII on the contention that no civil rights measure could be enacted under its present provisions saw their argument exploded in the action of the 1st session of the 85th Congress in placing the Civil Rights Act of 1957 on the statute books without resort to rule XXII.

That argument thus disposed of, there is only one conclusion which can be drawn logically and dispassionately from the actions of those who persist in their efforts to change rule XXII: That their onslaught to stifle freedom of speech on the floor of the Senate is an attack not only on the Senate itself but also on the stature, perquisites, and prerogatives of each Senator in national affairs and every other responsibility incident to the senatorship.

It is an attack which threatens the whole fabric of our form of government and strikes at the very vitals of representative government.

It is an attack which seeks to destroy the constitutional balance of Federal and State power and deal a death blow to the States as political entities.

It is an attack which seeks to make big government bigger and to centralize more and more power in Washington in a government less responsive to the wishes of the citizenry.

It is an attack which seeks to eliminate the spirit of compromise and respect for divergent views which has characterized the Senate for more than one and one-half centuries and to substitute for it the brute force of numbers.

It is an attack which seeks to put Congress only a short step from the unicameral system and which has as its ultimate aim the destruction of the seniority system which has given Congress its stability and sense of responsibility over the years.

Standing Senate rule XXII is a wise rule—the result of compromise—which protects full and free discussion of legislative proposals yet serves as a barrier to thwart those few Members who would abuse the privilege of free speech.

Standing Senate rule XXII is fair and to change it again would be to militate against the historic tradition of unlimited debate in the Senate.

The first change in rule XXII to authorize cloture was adopted in 1917 following a bitter controversy over the failure in the Senate of a proposal for arming American merchant ships prior to this Nation's entry into World War I. It was offered by Senator MARTIN as a "war measure" and, after debate at length, was adopted March 8, 1917, by an overwhelming vote of 76 to 3.

It required the votes of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting to invoke cloture.

Under a later ruling in 1948 by President Pro Tempore Arthur H. Vandenberg, it was held that the words "pending measure" in the Martin cloture amendment to rule XXII applied only to bills and resolutions and not to motions. That meant, of course, that debate on a motion to take up a bill was not subject to cloture under any circumstance.

It was in 1949 that the compromise on rule XXII was effectuated whereby its provision for cutting off debate was extended, not only to apply to any "pending measure" but also to "any measure, motion, or other matter pending before the Senate," and the requirement of "two-thirds of those voting" was changed to "two-thirds of the Senators duly chosen and sworn."

That was the compromise which still is in effect today.

While the two-thirds vote requirement to shut off debate was strengthened by the compromise, at the same time the dread threat of gag rule was extended over every facet of Senate procedure.

Those now attempting to make cloture easier and thus ultimately destroy freedom of debate in the Senate are not satisfied with what is a fair and reasonable compromise.

They complain that Standing Rule XXII in its application thwarts the wishes of the majority. However, authoritative observers of the American legislative process hold that a determined majority of Senators can find ways of passing any measure it desires without resorting to changing the very character and complexion of the body itself. The 1st session of the 85th Congress affords a case in point.

To argue that rule XXII by holding forth a threat of prolonged debate serves to prevent Senators from insisting upon legislation with controversial features is to challenge the depth and sincerity of the convictions of all 96 Senators.

Ample means are available at present to overcome what a majority at any time may feel to be needless obstruction in debate. The use of protracted sessions and strict enforcement of all Senate rules afford adequate safeguards to bring to an end even the most determined and prolonged debate. Whenever any issue of overriding importance to the welfare of the Nation arises, it goes without saying that debate will be limited accordingly.

Standing rule XXII permits limitation of debate by two-thirds of the Senate membership (64 Senators) 2 days after a petition has been submitted by 16 Senators. Thereafter debate is limited to 1 hour for each Senator. Cloture cannot be applied to a proposal to change the rules.

Frankness compels the observation that the ultimate objective of opponents of free debate in the Senate is cloture by a simple majority vote of Senators present at any given time. Eventual adoption of such a rule would make it possible for 25 Senators, a majority of a quorum, to impose gag rule.

Historically, freedom of debate in the Senate is not a party or sectional device. It has served the whole country and both political parties well at one time or another. History records the fact time and again that the benefits of free debate far outweigh the few instances where the privilege to speak thoroughly may have been abused—and only the most partisan would not admit there have been some abuses.

Any further concession on the part of proponents of free debate will have the disastrous eventual result of majority cloture. Then the process of erosion will turn to the seniority system and other long established and heretofore unchallenged procedures and precedents.

Under our plan of government the U.S. Senate is the great safety valve. It is a body which can prevent impasses from developing in our Nation and it is the best instrument for resolving seemingly irreconcilable conflicts. It has afforded a permanent basis for American unity; and that basis has its foundation in the right of every Senator, regardless of the size of the State from which he comes, to talk things out before the country.

The only real protection remaining for States which find themselves from time to time in the minority on any given issue in the Senate is a safe two-thirds rule on limiting debate.

Through the medium of free debate, the Senate provides the machinery by which all measures affecting the lives, fortunes, and sacred honor of the American people can be put to the critical test of unhurried examination by the collective intellect of a body expressly created as one of our governmental checks and balances.

Those who would destroy this right contend it imperils democracy and thwarts the wishes of the majority. In their zeal they forget that its very purpose is to provide a restraint upon the abuses of unbridled majority rule and, even more important, to protect the rights of the minorities of this Nation.

Our wise Founding Fathers were aware that the excesses of democracy can be as fearful in their consequences as are the excesses of totalitarianism. To safeguard against both extremes they gave us our republican form of government with its delicately contrived system of checks and balances of which freedom of debate in the the Senate is at least an implied, if not actual, part.

If minority rights are trampled in the Senate there is only one remaining remedy available to those who do not happen to be with the majority; that is, affiliation with a multiplicity of splinter parties. No greater catastrophe could befall our country than such enforced destruction of the two-party system and substitution of a countless number of political parties.

It does not take much vision to perceive that under such circumstances, a small militant minority, exercising the balance of power, could be catapulted into a position of leadership where it could inflict great harm on constitutional government and democratic processes.

Since its establishment the Senate of the United States has refused to be bound in a straitjacket. Its rules have had the flexibility the nature of the body demands.

Despite the protestations of some of its detractors, it is respected as the guardian of fundamental liberty in this country and enjoys the confidence and admiration of the masses of this Nation and of the world.

By and large, the Senate has adhered to the cardinal rule that no extreme or far-reaching legislation affecting the basic rights of the people of the United States be adopted without substantial unanimity and support of the Senators and their constituents.

Union, not division, has been the Senate goal.

The right of every Senator to freedom of debate is the great buffer which protects both the smaller and larger States from imposing upon each other.

Freedom of debate is the only effective screen which the people have against hidden defects, both unintentional and calculated, which escape detection in the hasty process of passage by the House of Representatives. Without this backstop for the people, unfairness, discrimination, and special privilege for the favored few might well come to be the rule rather than the exception.

Even a cursory study of constitutional history and an examination of contemporary documents penned at the time of the drafting of the Constitution and its approval by the States show beyond any doubt that the creation of the Senate, as a continuing council of States wherein each has an equal voice, was the price of forming the general Government.

At the formation of this Government the Constitutional Convention stood for the protection of private economic interests; a stronger central authority; a stabilized monetary policy; orderly legal processes; and for a republican form of government as opposed to an unlimited democracy.

The whole motivating spirit of the Convention—not expressed but clearly understood—was to make the Nation safe from the tyranny of unchecked majorities. The intention is unmistakable as one may deduce from James Madison's own notes and also from the papers of most of the delegates.

No doubt if Madison, Thomas Jefferson, Alexander Hamilton, and John Jay could return to the scene today they would be shocked at the manner in which some of their writings have been distorted out of context, particularly with reference to the question of the nature of the Senate and freedom of debate therein.

A favorite of the advocates of gag rule is to quote Alexander Hamilton's contributions to "The Federalist" in support of their position.

An examination of these quotations in the light of context and the theme of the entire series of letters reveals such quotation to be a complete distortion of truth.

The whole spirit pervading "The Federalist" and the elucidation of its component letters regarding the foundation of the Senate cry out for the maintenance of freedom of debate in that body.

Properly assaying the true meaning of "The Federalist" requires an understanding of the times in which the letters were written.

It must be borne in mind that Hamilton and the other patriots of that day were writing about inadequacies of the loosely drawn "Articles of Confederation" and in favor of the adoption of a clear-cut new Constitution. In the quotations most frequently attributed to Hamilton on this subject, he was detracting from the "Articles of Confederation" in a concerted effort to convince the people that the new Constitution was good for the country and should be ratified by the States.

Hamilton is often quoted from letter XXII in which he stressed the weakness of the requirement that legislation adopted by the Continental Congress receive the approval of three-fourths of all the States. That quotation, while applicable to that situation, by no stretch of the imagination can rightly be applied to free debate in the Senate.

Another quotation frequently attributed to Hamilton by proponents of majority cloture is the one referring to the treaty-making power and other "resolutions." There must have been strong sentiment for a constitutional two-thirds requirement before Senate approval, for Hamilton sought to allay the fears of the people urging the view that a simple two-thirds would be sufficient in any circumstance for protection against abuses.

By no rule of logic can the language quoted from Hamilton in letter LXXV be applied to the fundamental right of a State to be heard from fully through its Senators in Senate debate.

Thus, it is a gross distortion when we have those of the present seeking to apply the words of the great patriots of the past in an effort to detract from the Constitution and the principles of government which they established when, in reality, those quotations when written were in reference to the Articles of Confederation.

There is no comfort for any proponent of gag rule in the Senate in the words of any of these founders of our system of government. Jefferson, for example, wrote in his "Manual of Parliamentary Procedure":

"The rules of the Senate which allow full freedom of debate are designed for protection of the minority, and this design is a part of the warp and woof of our Constitution. You cannot remove it without damaging the whole fabric. Therefore, before tampering with this right, we should assure ourselves that what is lost will not be greater than what is gained."

Hamilton foresaw just such a day as this when he wrote in "The Federalist":

"There are particular moments in public affairs, when the people, stimulated by some irregular passion, or some illicit advantage, or misled by the artful misrepresentations of interested man, may call for measures which they themselves will afterwards be the most ready to lament and condemn. In these critical moments, how salutary will be the interference of some temperate and respectable body of citzens, in order to check the misguided career, and to suspend the blow meditated by the people against themselves until reason, justice, and truth can regain their authority over the public mind?"

It is significant that, in urging the adoption of the Constitution by the States, Hamilton emphasized that the Senate is far more than an "upper house" in the commonly accepted sense of the term:

"I am not unaware of the circumstances which distinguish the American from other popular governments, ancient as well as modern * * *. Many of the defects, as we have seen, which can only be supplied by a senatorial institution, are common to a numerous assembly frequently elected by the people, and to the people themselves * * *. The people can never willfully betray their own interests; but they may possibly be betrayed in the hands of one body of men, than where the concurrence of separate and dissimilar bodies is required in every public act."

Another phase of this question is whether the United States Senate is a continuing body and whether the Senate is the sole judge of the rules under which it functions.

"The Federalist" sheds important light on these subjects.

For instance, Hamilton in letter LXII stresses that the Senate is more than just an extended version of the House. He alludes to the qualifications required of Senators, the nature of the senatorial trust as contradistinguished from membership in the lower branch, and emphasizes the "necessity of some stable institution in the Government."

In letter LXIII he wrote:

"An assembly (the House of Representatives) elected for so short a term (2 years) as to be unable to provide more than one to two links in a chain of measures, on which the general welfare may essentially depend, ought not to be answerable for the final result, any more than a steward or tenant, engaged for one year could be justly made to answer for plans or improvements, which could not be accomplished in less than half a dozen years.

"The proper remedy for this defect must be an additional body in the legislative department, which, having sufficient permanency to provide for such objects as require a continued attention, and a train of measures, may be justly and effectually answerable for the attainment of those objects."

Those words adequately describe the role of the Senate and prove beyond all doubt the deliberate intent of the framers of our Government to create it as a continuing body.

Now, as to the question of whether the rules of the Senate carry over from session to session and are permanent, valid, and subsisting until changed by proper procedure, let us look to John Jay's Federalist letter LXIV for the incontrovertible answer:

"It was wise, therefore, in the [Constitutional] Convention to provide, not only that the power of making treaties should be committed to able and honest men, but also that they should continue in place a sufficient time to become perfectly acquainted with our national concerns, and to form and introduce a system of the management of them. The duration prescribed is such as will give them an opportunity of greatly extending their political information, and of rendering their accumulating experience more and more beneficial to their country.

"Nor has the Convention discovered less prudence in providing for the frequent elections of Senators in such a way, as to obviate the inconvenience of periodically transferring these great affairs entirely to new men—for, by leaving a considerable residue of old ones in place, uniformity and order, as well as a constant succession of official information will be preserved."

That language shatters once and for all time the contention that the life of the Senate is only 2 years and that its rules must be altered from session to session.

The system formed and introduced in the Senate to manage and resolve grave issues of national concern has served the country well.

The tragic inconvenience of periodic upheaval in this institution of the Government has been prevented; uniformity and order insured.

How has this been done?

There can be only one answer in the light of history: this body has functioned through wise and just rules that have withstood the tortuous test of time.

It is only reasonable and logical, therefore, that any proposed change in those rules should be open to the fullest and most completely unfettered debate.

If freedom of debate, the committee system, and the seniority system are destroyed or weakened in the Senate, this body will become nothing more than a useless appendage of the House of Representatives.

There has been much ado about the authority for moving the previous question having been included in the early rules of the Senate.

Though such was the case, the rule was resorted to only 4 times and used only 3 times in 22 years.

It can safely be concluded from that experience that any limitation on free expression was obnoxious to the patriots of that day. Certainly, it may be assumed further that this was the underlying reason that the rule was dropped by the Senate during the time Jefferson was President.

The fact of the rule being in existence during these first years is hardly significant. It means merely that it was carried over automatically from the Continental Congress and was later discarded.

It is argued by the opponents of free debate that the Senate of the United States is the only place in the world where the gag rule does not prevail.

My answer to that is: "So what?"

The patriots who established this Government were free men and did not elect to surrender their new and hard-won liberties nor to copy the governments of foreign lands where freedom either did not exist or came and went with the political tide.

The point also has been made that the Senate's cloture rule is more liberal than similar rules of most State senates. To make such a comparison is to misconstrue totally the unique position which the U.S. Senate occupies in our Federal-State structure.

As we have seen from Alexander Hamilton's writings, the Senate is not an "upper house" of a national legislature in any sense of the word.

The Senate exercises quasi-executive functions in relation to the treaty-making power.

The Senate sits as a judicial body in impeachment proceedings.

The Senate must give its advice and consent to the appointments of the Executive.

The Senate is the repository of State sovereignty on the national level.

The Senate cannot legitimately be compared in any terms with either State senates or with the assemblies of foreign nations.

One reason given by those advocating that the Senate of the United States surrender its freedom of debate is that the House of Commons of the British Parliament has done so.

What they either forget or choose deliberately to ignore is that much of the difficulty experienced by Great Britain as a nation and as a world power has stemmed directly from the loss of freedom of debate in the House of Commons and a steady diminution in the power of the House of Lords.

The British system of government is not and never has been comparable to the constitutional system of government created here.

Every right the Englishman has is at the mercy of a majority in the House of Commons.

It was not always so.

A little over 75 years ago unlimited debate in Commons and the veto power in the House of Lords served as mighty barriers against the evils of state socialism. Those two safeguards restrained competing political parties from inflicting too great harm on each other or on the country, but they were thorns in the flesh of the Liberal and later the Labor Party.

The former Deputy Prime Minister of the Labor government, Herbert Morrison, writes in his book, "Government and Parliament," of how free debate was lost in the House of Commons:

"Although there had been talk about the need to expedite business by curtailing private members' rights, it was only in the panic which followed the successful Irish obstruction in the 1880's that the House parted with its long preserved liberties. One of the most far-reaching of these reforms was the closure (that is to say, the motion 'that the question be now put'). It was first used by Mr. Speaker Brand, on February 2, 1881, who, in the course of long debate and considerable obstruction, decided to put the question without further debate. (Before the introduction of the closure members could proceed with debate indefinitely.) * * * And it was eventually decided that a 3 to 1 majority would be required for a closure in a house of not less than 300 members."

Mr. Morrison goes on to explain that the standing order governing closure in Commons today requires only a simple majority which cannot be less than 100 members.

Before 1911, Lords possessed absolute veto power over Commons. As a result of the rejection of the finance bill of 1909 by the Lords, the Liberal Government of that day appealed to the people and won a majority on the issue. A measure to curb the powers of Lords was offered, and a promise obtained from the King that, should the Lords reject the bill, he would create a sufficient number of peers to insure its passage.

The threat was effective and in 1911 the Parliament Act became law. By it the veto of Lords was curtailed for a period of 2 years for bills passed by the Common in three successive sessions (whether of the same Parliament or not) and was abolished altogether in respect to appropriations.

The Labor Party in its pre-election platform of 1945 stated:

"We give clear notice that we will not tolerate obstruction of the people's will by the House of Lords."

On October 31, 1947, the Parliament bill was presented to the House of Commons and passed on December 10. It was rejected by the House of Lords on June 9, 1948.

The bill provided that, in the future, such legislation might be passed into law, notwithstanding the rejection of the House of Lords, if (1) it had been passed by the House of Commons in two successive sessions, instead of three as provided for by the Parliament Act of 1911, and (2) 1 year (instead of 2 years) had elapsed between the date of the first second reading in the House of Commons and the date on which it was passed finally by Commons for a second time.

The bill further restricting the power of Lords was again passed by the Commons on September 21, 1948, and again rejected, September 23, 1948.

The bill was passed for the third time by the Commons on November 14, 1949. It was rejected by the Lords on November 29, but received the royal assent and became law on December 16, 1949, under the terms of the Parliament Act of 1911.

Thus was removed from the Government of Britain a great measure of its stability and strength and the whole world was the loser.

We know the rest and those who have the vision to see beyond the transitory objectives of political advantage should be able to detect the grave danger of this bit of history repeating itself in the United States today.

It is interesting to note in retrospect that the House of Lords—although liquidated in all but name by an unbridled majority in its sister chamber—has clung steadfastly to the principle of freedom of debate. It still has only two standing rules governing debate: that a peer can speak only once on the same motior and debate must be relevant to the question before the House.

Much has been made of the fact that Standing Rule XXII gives "power" to the individual Senator which those so contending maintain should be possessed by the majority, right or wrong. Such a view is contrary to the origin of the Senate as the voice of the individual States in the Federal establishment.

There is no escaping the fact that proposals for further limiting debate in the Senate would have the effect of negating the power, the prestige, and the perquisites of the Senator as an individual officeholder and of the Senate as a protective instrumentality of the Federal Government.

The smaller States rightly were given equal representation in the Senate but this influence will be dissipated in direct proportion to the degree of any revision of rule XXII.

During the last quarter of a century we have seen an unending encroachment on the powers of Congress by both the executive and judicial branches. One by one its powers, and the prerogatives of its Members, have been dissipated either by delegation or acquiescence.

Congressional powers over the purse, over patronage, over the budget, over trade, over war powers and all other phases of government operation have slipped away or have been greatly reduced.

It is time to reverse this trend and the proper place to start is by refusing to surrender the right of freedom of speech on the floor of the Senate.

No more eloquent defense of the right of the individual Senator to the power which comes through freedom of debate has ever been penned than that written by the distinguished and erudite journalist, William S. White of the New York Times, in his book "Citadel—The Story of the United States Senate." It is appropriate that his conclusions be considered here:

"Conscious though one is of the abuse of senatorial power, one glories nevertheless in the circumstances that there is such a place, where big Senators may rise and flourish from small States.

"For the Institution protects and expresses that last, true heart of democratic theory, the triumphant distinction and oneness of the individual and of the little State, the infinite variety in each of which is the juice of national life.

"It is perhaps often forgotten that the democratic ideal is not all majority; that, indeed, at its most exquisite moments the ideal is not for the majority of all but actually for the minority of one.

"The Senate, therefore, may be seen as a uniquely constitutional place in that it is here, and here alone, outside the courts—to which access is not always easy—that the minority will again and again be defended against the majority's most passionate will.

"This is a large part of the whole meaning of the Institution. Deliberately it puts Rhode Island, in terms of power, on equal footing with Illinois. Deliberately by its tradition and practice of substantially unlimited debate, it rarely closes the door to any idea, however wrong, until all that can possibly be said has been said, and said again. The price sometimes is high. The time killing, sometimes, seems intolerable and dangerous. The license, sometimes, seems endless; but he who silences the cruel and irresponsible man today must first recall that the brave and lonely man may in the same way be silenced tomorrow. * * *

"For illustration, those who denounce the filibuster against, say, the compulsory civil rights program, might recall that the weapon has more than one blade and that today's pleading minority could become tomorrow's arrogant majority. They might recall, too, that the techniques of communication, and with them the drenching power of propaganda, have vastly risen in our time when the gaunt aerials thrust upward all across the land. They might recall that the public is not always right all at once and that it is perhaps not too bad to have one place in which matters can be examined at leisure, even a leisure uncomfortably prolonged. * * *

"It is, in the very nature of the Senate, absolutely necessary for the small States to maintain the concept of the minority's veto power, having in mind that it is only within the Institution that his power can be asserted or maintained. * * *

"Where a powerful majority really wants a bill it will find means to have its way, cloture or no cloture."

In considering the implications of "majority rule," one must not lose sight of a few simple facts about the origin and composition of the Senate.

It is impossible to apply to the Senate with any degree of accuracy the principle of popular majority rule as we usually consider it. The very composition of the United States Senate where all States have an equal vote prevents such an application.

It is possible for various combinations of 40 Senators to represent anywhere from 20 to 80 percent of the population of the Nation.

All of the great injustices of history have been committed in the name of unchecked and unbridled majority rule. The late Senator James A. Reed of Missouri, in one of the most forceful speeches ever delivered before the Senate, observed with great truth:

"The majority crucified Jesus Christ.

"The majority burned the Christians at the stake.

"The majority drove the Jews into exile and to the ghetto.

"The majority established slavery.

"The majority chained to stakes and surrounded with circles of flame martyrs through all the ages of the world's history.

"The majority jeered when Columbus said the world was round.

"The majority threw him into a dungeon for having discovered a new world.

"The majority said that Galileo must recant or that Galileo must go to prison.

"The majority cut off the ears of John Pym because he dared advocate the liberty of the press."

Some of the terms of reference to Standing Rule XXII are both shocking and disturbing not only because they insult the intelligence and integrity of those privileged to serve their States in the Senate but also because of the manner in which they distort facts and ignore history to support partisan ends.

A few choice current examples are that Senate rule XXII—

Must be changed to conform with the challenge of Russian missiles and sputniks.

Paralyzes decision in the Senate.

Is archaic.

Would have been opposed at the time of the adoption of the Constitution.

Is contrary to the views of the Founding Fathers.

Violates fundamental parliamentary law.

Is at odds with early Senate procedures.

Is not supported by the national interest.

Is not supported by commonsense.

Is not supported by history.

Stultifies Congress.

Violates the Constitution.

Is offensive to the dignity of the Senate.

Has destroyed the Senate's deliberative function.

Thwarts discipline in the Senate.

These and many more similar unfounded assertions and puerile implications which could be cited are offensive to the character of every Member of the Senate and to the memory of those now departed who either served under or helped draft Standing Rule XXII.

I am indignant at the implication that I, or any other Member of the Senate, would consent to serve under, let alone defend, any rule of procedure which could to any degree be as reprehensible and alien to the American concept as opponents of Standing Rule XXII would picture it to be.

Now is no time to forget the lessons of history.

Before tearing down a chamber that has served the United States and its people well, Senators should search for truth by asking themselves:

Are we so blind as not to realize that if free debate perishes in the Senate our leaders in the future will be rising like jacks-in-the-box to move the previous question?

Do we not know that this evil thing will become the weapon of the majority party or coalition to be resorted to habitually in stifling all opposition?

Do we not know that when such an event comes to pass minority thought and opinion will lie prostrate and defenseless against the tyrannical abuses of any transient majority that might for the moment occupy the seats of the Senate?

Have we forgotten that everyone, at one time or another, belongs to a minority?

Have we lost sight of the unchanging truth that unbridled majority sway without proper restraint is mob rule?

Are our memories so short that we have forgotten the maxim that free government destroying dissenting opinion, thereby destroys itself?

Have we forgotten that in such circumstances dictatorship of one form or another steps into the vacuum thus created to wrest all rights from the people, minorities and majorities alike?

The alternative to unlimited debate is gag rule, which was aptly defined by the late Senator Reed as "the last resort of the legislative scoundrel."

The issue at stake here is far more fundamental than any mere question of legislation. It is as basic as our freedom itself. Gag rule, and its stepchild, censorship, are abhorrent to and incompatible with our American heritage.

The Senate has proved itself worthy of the rules by which it now operates.

Commonsense and the Nation's survival dictate that our time-honored procedures should not be subjected to whimsical tampering on the slightest provocation.

It is essential to our interests as a nation that we keep vital and inviolate our system of checks and balances.

With unlimited debate in the U.S. Senate, all Americans have the assurance that no act jeopardizing their rights will ever be proposed without some Member of the Senate having the opportunity to resist it and to warn the Nation of its consequences.

Franklin D. Roosevelt, while Governor of New York, foresaw just such dangers to the Republic, in a radio address on States rights, delivered March 2, 1940, when he warned:

"The moment a mere numerical superiority by either States or voters in this country proceeds to ignore the needs and desires of the minority, and, for their own selfish purposes or advancement, hamper or oppress that minority or debar them in any way from equal privileges and equal rights—that moment will mark the failure of our constitutional system."

His warning, valid then, is even more so today.

It is a concern Americans share fullest in this hour.

It is a concern which the Senate can ignore only at its own peril.

It is a concern which the Senate can allay only by upholding Standing Rule XXII as written.

HERMAN E. TALMADGE.

INDIVIDUAL VIEWS OF MR. CURTIS

I do not favor Senate Resolution 17.

A number of scholarly statements have been written setting forth the historical background of the rule in the U.S. Senate allowing unlimited debate. Rather than attempt to add to such statements, I wish, briefly, to state my own views which have been arrived at by observing the Senate for 20 years.

1. I believe that the right of unlimited debate is a force for the preservation of individual liberty, the maintenance of a government of law, and the adherence to the Constitution and the rights of our sovereign States. It places the rights of a minority, regardless of how small, and the rights of the individual in proper focus.

2. I believe that unlimited debate in the Senate tends to slow down and prevent the passage of legislation, thereby retarding the growth of big government and lessening the burdens of government on our people.

3. I believe that in some place in our large and complex government there should be unlimited discussion of public issues and that the Senate by reason of its size and its tradition and history is the logical place for unlimited debate.

4. I believe that the present cloture rule is an adequate restraint upon the right of unlimited debate in any time of emergency.

For the foregoing reasons I am opposed to Senate Resolution 17.

CARL T. CURTIS.

At the time the Committee on Rules and Administration filed its report (S. Rept. 1509) on Senate Resolution 17 (Calendar No. 1534) I had not completed compiling certain historical data which I felt should be included in that report. Thus I obtained permission of the committee to file this information at a later date as part 2 of the report.

This report, in the form of my individual views, is in no sense a dissent to the brief majority views, to which I fully subscribe. This second part of Report No. 1509 is intended to supplement and support the fine work already done by giving more fully the history of control over debate in the Senate.

This history clearly shows, I believe, that up to about the time of the Civil War a majority of the Senate, under its rules and precedents and the dignity of its customs, did have the authority to—and for the most part did—effectively control debate and prevent filibusters by insisting that Senators confine their speeches to the question at issue and that Senators conduct themselves in a manner in keeping with the traditional courtesy and dignity of the Senate. Exceptions may be cited, but the truly representative picture of the Senate prior to the Civil War, as shown by the historical records of the Senate, is that of a body of men who observed dignity and restraint in debate, who did not consider talking to consume time a parliamentary instrument appropriate for use by the Senate. When delay by speech was tolerated the Senators engaged in this dilatory device either kept their remarks germane to the issue or the majority did not choose at the moment to insist upon strict observance of the rules and precedents. In short, as the evidence presented below demonstrates, the filibuster as a device not merely to delay but to prevent Senate action is a modern institution which finds no support or sanction in early Senate history and practice.

Under the present rules, moreover, there is an ever-present danger of this kind of stultifying filibuster. This is the evil which a majority of Senators desire to root out. Filibusters which are staged by one or more Senators merely for the purpose of delaying a vote in the Senate for a time to bring the question dramatically to the attention of the country may or may not be justified in particular instances, depending on one's point of view.

But these filibusters do not prevent the majority from ultimately acting and are not the kind of conduct against which Senate Resolution 17 is aimed.

THE PRESENT RULE AND PROPOSALS FOR CHANGE

By their cosponsorship of Senate resolutions designed to amend rule XXII, at least 53 Senators in Congress have expressed themselves in favor of changing the Standing Rules of the Senate, in order to make it easier to control filibusters. Thirty-eight Senators were cosponsors of Senate Resolution 30, submitted by the distinguished Senate minority leader, Mr. Knowland, in behalf of himself, the distinguished majority leader, Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and 36 other Senators. The senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] submitted Senate Resolution 17, on behalf of himself and 14 other Senators, including the junior Senator from New Jersey. In short, a majority of the Members of the Senate are in favor of amending rule XXII in one way or another, having in mind the general objective of strengthening the control of the Senate over debate.

Senate Resolution 17 was reported from the Rules Committee on April 30, 1958, and, therefore, has been a pending item on the Senate Calendar for more than 3 months.

Under the present wording of rule XXII, a limitation on debate may be imposed only by the affirmative vote of two-thirds of the Senators duly chosen and sworn; that is, 64 Senators at the present time. This means that in order to prevent the imposition of cloture, only 33 Senators need to vote against it or to fail to appear in the Senate, to vote either way. An absent Senator in effect votes against cloture, under the present wording of rule XXII.

Senate Resolution 30 provides that cloture may be imposed on the affirmative votes of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting. Senate Resolution 17, on the other hand, provides two routes to cloture. One route, similar to that under Senate Resolution 30, is that two-thirds of the Senators present and voting may impose cloture. The other route is that cloture may be provided after a waiting period of 15 days on the affirmative vote of a majority of the Senators duly chosen and sworn, which at the present time would be 49 Senators. The difficulty with Senate Resolution 30, so far as the voting requirement is concerned, is that it would not constitute any significant change from the present rule. A further difficulty with Senate Resolution 30, which I only mention at this point, is that it would attempt to nullify the constitutional power of each Senate to make its own rules.

We know from the history of efforts to impose cloture from the beginning of the cloture rule in 1917 up to 1949—when the wording of rule XXII was changed from "two-thirds of those present and voting" to "two-thirds of those duly chosen and sworn"—that out of the 19 attempts to invoke cloture, only 4 were successful. Since 1949, 3 more attempts to impose cloture failed, and would have failed even if the rule had been "two-thirds of those present and voting," as it read prior to 1949. Since 1927, 12 attempts have been made to impose cloture. All of them failed.

In summary, since 1917, in 22 attempts to adopt cloture, 4 succeeded under the requirement that two-thirds of those Senators present and voting favor it. If rule XXII had always required two-thirds of the entire membership of the Senate, the successful attempts to impose cloture would have numbered 3—only 1 less than under the former rule requiring two-thirds of those Senators present and voting. This is the same wording as that contained in Senate Resolution 30. On the other hand, if rule XXII had, from 1919 on, permitted cloture on the basis of a majority of the entire membership of the Senate—49 Senators—the successful attempts to impose cloture would have numbered 9. These facts indicate the insignificance of the change proposed in Senate Resolution 30.

The change proposed in Senate Resolution 17 would restore[1] at least a modicum of control of debate in the Senate, and permit a fair application of majority rule in the deliberations.

Free debate versus filibuster

The basic issue involved in the effort to secure reasonable control over debate in the Senate has been greatly confused by the very different meanings that have come to be given to the term "free debate."

It is, therefore, of first importance to distinguish at the outset between the right to debate fully the merits of a controversial subject—a right sometimes spoken of as "the right of full or free debate"—and the right to filibuster—the right to talk without any limitation other than that imposed by physical strength. The latter assumes the right to speak, not to the issue in an effort to influence a vote on its merits, but merely to consume time and thus to thwart a majority of Senators (and the Senate insofar as it has power to act as a body) in their desire to come to a vote. Nonetheless, it is often labeled by the champions of "filibuster" as "the right of free debate."

The confusion over the term "free debate" has not come about entirely by accident. Rather than appear as champions of the absolute right to filibuster, the opponents of amending rule XXII cast themselves in the role of defenders of minority opinion and free debate. They rest their case largely on the emotional impact of this term "free debate" and the myth that the "early Senate" deliberated under rules permitting Senators to engage in irrelevant and dilatory speech under a right of free or unlimited debate. For instance, no responsible opponent of amending rule XXII who offered testimony at the hearings of the Talmadge-Javits special subcommittee contended for no limitation whatsoever on debate in the Senate. Rather they declared for a "moderate" or "reasonable" cloture rule designed to protect the country from the "tyranny of a temporary majority." They argued that the present rule provided such "reasonable" protection.

As already indicated, however, the experience over the last decades demonstrates that under the present rule cloture as a practical matter cannot be imposed in the face of determined opposition by even a small number of Senators. Because of this very practical fact, those who wish to defend the right to filibuster can, without seeming to be inconsistent, safely say that they advocate a "reasonable" cloture rule even while relying on the filibuster or the threat of it to avoid the passage of legislation which they strongly oppose. Thus it is that many people, in their attempt to understand the problem of filibusters have been confused by the semantic shell game played so deftly with the words "the right of free debate."

The problem is seen with far greater clarity if it is viewed in the light of the basic requirements of an effective and democratic legislative process. They are:

1. The minority on any pending question must have an opportunity to debate fully the merits of that question, and

2. The majority, after opportunity to the minority to debate fully any question, must have the right, if it so desires, to reach a vote on the question.

Within the scope of these two principles, I, too, believe strongly in the "right of free debate." At the same time I reject absolutely "the right to filibuster" as repugnant to democratic procedures and as violative of the spirit of the Constitution.

Those opposed to changing the rule to make filibusters more difficult have advanced many arguments, but their main case has rested on the alleged right of a minority of Senators, usually representing a large sectional interest in the Nation (such as the South), to prevent by filibuster legislative action by a majority of Senators (but less than 64 Senators). This argument is a restatement in modern terms of the theory of concurrent majorities so ably formulated by John C. Calhoun. Under his theory legislation favored by a majority in the country as a whole should be subject to the veto of a sectional interest. The country rejected Calhoun's theory of government at the time of the Civil War, but its spirit has been reborn in the form of the modern filibuster. The only difference is that where Calhoun would have given the minority a direct veto, the filibuster applies an indirect veto. And the opposing minority need not be a sectional interest though it usually has been so.

Early Senate precedents on freedom of debate

In support of their argument that the rules should not be changed to prevent a minority from imposing a bar to legislation by veto, the opponents of rule change rely on their interpretation of the spirit of the Constitution as shown by selected excerpts from the records available to us of the debates in the Constitutional Convention of 1787 and by selected passages from "The Federalist Papers." The one source they do not rely on is the wording of the Constitution itself, which clearly states that except for the situations specifically mentioned therein, a majority of the whole Senate "shall constitute a quorum to do business."

They refer to the Constitution as a magnificent compromise worked out by the Founding Fathers between the big States and the little States. They speak of its checks and balances and refer to Senators as ambassadors from sovereign States. Out of all this, they have conjured up the power, even duty, of Senators to protect States rights by the senatorial privilege of filibustering permitted under the present rules.

[1] I use the word "restore" advisedly because the problem for the present Senate as a body is to restore a semblance of the control over debate that the early Senate had during the years when the Senate earned its reputation as the greatest deliberative body in the world.

The fact is, however, that the available information concerning the debates in the Constitutional Convention of 1787 as well as the views expressed in "The Federalist Papers" which even remotely touch on the question of debate are both meager, and when taken out of context, conflicting.

The junior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] in his analysis [2] of the ideas which governed the deliberations of the Constitutional Convention clearly showed, I think, that the prevailing view among the delegates favored majority control of the Senate and would have opposed the right to filibuster if that issue had been squarely raised. I am content to let this point rest on his brilliant analysis and shall not duplicate the evidence here.

The other principal bulwark of the case made out by those opposed to amending the cloture rule is the myth, previously alluded to, that from the Senate's early days the license of unrestrained and irrelevant speech—"the right to free debate"—has been a traditional and historic senatorial prerogative. The opponents to rule change rely on this myth as a strong precedent, taken alone, and also as support for their claims that the spirit of the Constitution would be somehow violated if the Senate rules were changed to make cloture a practical possibility.

The opponents of change do have trouble, however, with the fact that the first Senate rules did provide for a motion for the previous question, which under general parliamentary law, immediately closes debate and brings the pending issue to a vote. We can take it for granted, I am sure, that the Members of the first Senate, some of whom were delegates to the Convention of 1787, had freshly in mind, at the time they adopted their rules, the ideas which prevailed during the deliberations at Philadelphia.[3]

The opponents of rule change attempt to avoid this difficulty by contending that the modern use of the previous question is a perversion of that motion as used in the 17th century British Parliament and as inherited and used by the Continental Congress and the early U.S. Congress. They are aided in their contention by the confusion which has in recent years surrounded the early use of the previous question motion. Senator JAVITS in his incisive historical account of this motion, supported by the thorough and brilliant scholarship of Mr. Irving Brant, the eminent biographer of James Madison, has dispelled the confusion and made it clear that in the 17th and 18th century House of Commons the motion for the previous question was a most effective instrument of cloture.

I shall therefore not burden this discussion with the historical details of the use of the previous question motion in the House of Commons but refer those interested in a full discussion to Senator JAVITS' individual views.

In the Continental Congress the motion for the previous question was available to close debate.

In the U.S. Senate and the House of Representatives [4] also this motion was a device to bring debate to a close. That this motion could also be put to other uses such as delaying further consideration of an issue is beside the point. The use the motion would serve in any given situation depended upon how the Members of the body voted. A majority by their affirmative or negative vote determined the effect of the motion.

A stronger argument available to opponents of rule change based upon the early use of this motion in the Senate (and in the House too, for that matter) is that debate was originally permitted both on the motion for the previous question and thereafter, even if it carried, on the main question. This fact has led some students of this motion to the erroneous conclusion that debate on a motion for the previous question could be had "without let or hindrance." [5] Those who so hold, however, overlook two controlling factors: (1) Under the Senate rules in effect until 1828 the Vice President, as the President of the Senate, had authority to decide all questions of order and decorum without appeal; and (2) Thomas Jefferson's "Manual of Parliamentary Practice," which codified the general parliamentary law in effect at the time it was compiled and which was regarded as controlling on all questions not specifically covered by Senate rules, provided in section XVII: "No one is to speak impertinently or beside the question superfluously or tediously." In other words, in the British practice and the later American practice, an affirmative vote on a motion for the previous question usually was followed immediately by a vote on the main question without debate. This was so because the Members of these parliamentary bodies knew that when a favorable vote was obtained on a motion for the previous question, the sense of the House was to close debate and vote on the main question. If, however, a Member or two desired to develop a point considered by them important to the issue, the courtesy which prevailed in those Houses would permit the additional remarks to be made, except in times of great political tension as in the years of the Cromwellian revolution in England in the middle of the 17th century or in the turbulent days in the House of Representatives in 1811 leading up to the War of 1812. Amendments could even be offered, and I do not doubt that on occasion a Senator, after a motion for the previous question had been made or following a favorable vote thereon, was indulged while he talked germanely, even though tediously, in order to allow a colleague to reach the Chamber from some nearby place in the Capital in time to vote. I daresay that on a few rare occasions a Senator or two was even permitted to engage in extended debate in this manner while a few or more much needed votes were hurrying by stagecoach, by horseback, or by boat to reach the Senate Chamber in time. Such situations, however, were usually cared for by adjourning the debate for a day or two.

Thus it is that both sides to the controversy about the effect of a motion for the previous question are in part correct. Those who have held that the motion did bring debate to a close are right—that was certainly the usual practice. But the opponents of the rule change are also right in saying that a motion for the previous question did not shut off the opportunity to offer remarks, especially if they were brief and to the point at issue. But they are grossly incorrect in representing that in the House of Commons, in the Continental Congress, in the early Senate, or in the early House of Representatives, a Member could speak "impertinently, superfluously, or tediously without let or hindrance." The majority was always there to cut off a member who was so foolish as to step beyond the boundaries of traditional parliamentary propriety and decorum and thus tempt too far the patience of the majority.[6] In short, majority rule was absolute in those days—at least insofar as "free debate" was concerned. The privilege was generally extended fully because it was rarely abused. The privilege varied inversely with the abuse.

A look at the record is persuasive.

The pertinent rules of 1789 are as follows:

"The report of the committee appointed to determine upon rules for conducting business in the Senate, was agreed to. Whereupon,

"Resolved, That the following rules, from No. I to XIX, inclusive, be observed.

* * * * *

"III. Every Member, when he speaks, shall address the Chair, standing in his place, and when he has finished, shall sit down.

"IV. No Member shall speak more than twice in any one debate on the same day, without leave of the Senate.

"VI. No motion shall be debated until the same has been seconded.

* * * * *

"VIII. While a question is before the Senate, no motion shall be received unless for an amendment, for the previous question, or for postponing the main question, or to commit it, or to adjourn.

"IX. The previous question being moved and seconded, the question from the Chair shall be: 'Shall the main question be now put?' And if the nays prevail, the main question shall not then be put.

"XVI. When a Member shall be called to order, he shall sit down until the President shall have determined whether he is in order or not; and every question of order shall be decided by the President, without debate; but, if there be a doubt in his mind, he may call for the sense of the Senate."

"Jefferson's Manual"

The following excerpts from "Jefferson's Manual" also have evidential value on the early Senate usages concerning debate.

[3] By the time the Senate adopted its first rules on April 16, 1789, 20 Senators had been chosen and 16 had appeared to take their seats in the Senate. Of these, 13 were present on April 16, of whom 9 had served in the Continental Congress. Of these nine, six had also served as delegates to the Constitutional Convention of 1787. Of the committee of five Senators elected to draft rules, the chairman and one other had served in the Continental Congress and another one had been a delegate to the 1787 Convention. When the first Senate reached its full strength on June 25, 1790, 18 of the 26 Senators had served in the Continental Congress and 12 had been delegates to the Convention.

In his inaugural address to the Senate on April 21, 1789, Vice President John Adams said: "It would be superfluous, to gentlemen of your great experience, to urge the necessity of order."

[4] And later, in the Senate of the Confederacy.

[5] This contention was made during the debate in January 1957 on Senator Anderson's motion to adopt rules at the beginning of the 85th Cong.

[6] In the House of Commons and in the Continental Congress it was the patience of the Speaker as supported by the majority that would be tempted, and in the Senate down to 1828 it was the patience of the Vice President.

a right to be heard a second time (Smyth's Comw. L., 2, c. 3; Arcan. Parl., 17).

"But he may be permitted to speak again to clear a matter of fact (3 Grey, 357, 416), or merely to explain himself (2 Hats., 73) in some material part of his speech (Ib., 75), or to the manner or words of the question, keeping himself to that only, and not traveling into the merits of it (Memorials in Hakew., 29), or to the orders of the House, if they be transgressed, keeping within that line, and not falling into the matter itself (Mem. Hakew., 30, 31).

"No one is to speak impertinently or beside the question, superfluously, or tediously (Scob., 31, 33; 2 Hats., 166, 168; Hale, Parl., 133).

"Nevertheless, if a Member finds that it is not the inclination of the House to hear him, and that by conversation or any other noise they endeavor to drown his voice, it is his most prudent way to submit to the pleasure of the House, and sit down; for it scarcely ever happens that they are guilty of this piece of ill manners without sufficient reason, or inattentive to a Member who says anything worth their hearing (2 Hats., 77, 78).

"Section XXXII. Reading Papers

"It is equally an error to suppose that any Member has a right, without a question put, to lay a book or paper on the table, and have it read, on suggesting that it contains matter infringing on the privileges of the House (2 Hats., 117, 118).

"For the same reason, a Member has not a right to read a paper in his place, if it be objected to, without leave of the House. But this rigor is never exercised but where there is an intentional or gross abuse of the time and patience of the House.

"A Member has not a right even to read his own speech, committed to writing, without leave. This also is to prevent an abuse of time, and therefore is not refused but where that is intended (2 Grey, 227)."

But most important is the preface to his Manual which is quoted in full with emphasis supplied by italics:

"Jefferson's Manual[7] of Parliamentary Practice with references to analogous Senate rules

Preface

"The Constitution of the United States, establishing a legislature for the Union under certain forms, authorizes each branch of it 'to determine the rules of its own proceedings.' The Senate has accordingly formed some rules for its own government; but these going only to few cases, it has referred to the decision of its President, without debate and without appeal, all questions of order arising either under its own rules or where it has provided none. This places under the discretion of the President a very extensive field of decision, and one which, irregularly exercised, would have a powerful effect on the proceedings and determinations of the House. The President must feel, weightily and seriously, this confidence in his discretion, and the necessity of recurring, for its government, to some known system of rules, that he may neither leave himself free to indulge caprice or passion nor open to the imputation of them. But to what system of rules is he to recur, as supplementary to those of the Senate? To this there can be but one answer. To the system of regulations adopted for the government of some one of the parliamentary bodies within these States, or of that which has served as a prototype to most of them. This last is the model which we have all studied, while we are little acquainted with the modifications of it in our several States. It is deposited, too, in publications possessed by many and open to all. Its rules are probably as wisely constructed for governing the debates of a deliberative body, and obtaining its true sense, as any which can become known to us; and the acquiescence of the Senate, hitherto, under the references to them, has given them the sanction of its approbation.

"Considering, therefore, the law of proceedings in the Senate as composed of the precepts of the Constitution, the regulations of the Senate, and, where these are silent, of the rules of Parliament, I have here endeavored to collect and digest so much of these as is called for in ordinary practice, collating the parliamentary with the senatorial rules, both where they agree and where they vary. I have done this as well to have them at hand for my own government as to deposit with the Senate the standard by which I judge and am willing to be judged. I could not doubt the necessity of quoting the sources of my information, among which Mr. Hatsel's most valuable book is preeminent; but as he has only treated some general heads, I have been obliged to recur to other authorities in support of a number of common rules of practice to which his plan did not descend. Sometimes each authority cited supports the whole passage. Sometimes it rests on all taken together. Sometimes the authority goes only to a part of the test, the residue being inferred from known rules and principles. For some of the most familiar forms no written authority is or can be quoted; no writer having supposed it necessary to repeat what all were presumed to know. The statement of these must rest on their notoriety.

"I am aware that authorities can often be produced in opposition to the rules which I lay down as parliamentary. An attention to date will generally remove their weight. The proceedings of Parliament in ancient times, and for a long while, were crude, multiform, and embarrassing. They have been, however, constantly advancing toward uniformity and accuracy, and have now attained a degree of aptitude to their object beyond which little is to be desired or expected.

"Yet I am far from the presumption of believing that I may not have mistaken the parliamentary practice in some cases, and especially in those minor forms, which, being practiced daily, are supposed known to everybody, and therefore have not been committed to writing. Our resources in this quarter of the globe for obtaining information on that part of the subject are not perfect. But I have begun a sketch, which those who come after me will successively correct and fill up till a code of rules shall be formed for the use of the Senate, the effects of which may be accuracy in business, economy of time, order, uniformity, and impartiality."

This evidence alone suffices, I believe, to make clear that the early Senate would never have tolerated being rendered impotent days and weeks by the unseemly spectacle of Senators one after another taking turns in speaking irrelevantly and tediously merely to consume time. The very size of the Senate made a successful filibuster almost impossible. The first Senate had only 26 Members. By the time of the admission of Missouri as a State in 1821, the number of Senators had grown to 48. It was still only 66 in 1859, when Oregon was admitted. In fact it was my faith in the Senate as a great deliberative body which first made me suspicious of the myth of "free debate" and caused me to reexamine the entire question.

Seventeen hundred and eighty-nine through eighteen hundred and twenty-eight

Both John Adams and Thomas Jefferson presided with firmness and dignity over the Senate during their respective terms. Certainly they did not tolerate, and no one thought of attempting, the modern type of filibustering during their terms as Vice President. In the case of Adams, one can find complaints that he talked more than any Senator and lectured Senators whenever he felt it advisable to do so on matters of decorum and order in debate.

In the case of Aaron Burr, the next Vice President, some advocates for retaining the present rules have suggested that it was at his initiative that reference to the previous question was deleted in the first general revision of the rules in March 1806. I have found no evidence to support this claim. In any case, the evidence we have indicates that Burr presided over the Senate in the tradition set by Adams and Jefferson and that if he suggested the deletion of the previous question from the rules it was because it was not needed. Furthermore, we know from his farewell address to the Senate that Aaron Burr was no advocate of unlimited and irrelevant debate. On page 71, volume 14 of the Annals of Congress—8th Congress, 2d session, March 2, 1805—the editor of the debates gave the following account:

"He [Vice President Burr] doubted not but that they [the Members of the Senate] found occasion to observe, that to act without delay was not always to act without reflection; that error was often to be preferred to indecision. * * *

"That his errors, whatever they might have been, were those of rule and principle and not of caprice. * * *

"That if, in the opinion of any, the discipline which had been established approached to rigor, they would at least admit that it was uniform and indiscriminate. * * *

"That the ignorant and unthinking affected to treat as unnecessary and fastidious a rigid attention to rules and decorum. * * *

"But he thought nothing trivial which touched, however remotely, the dignity of that body, and he appealed to their experience for the justice of this sentiment and urged them in language the most impressive, and in a manner the most commanding to avoid the smallest relaxation of the habits which he had endeavored to inculcate and establish."

Further evidence that Burr was no friend of irrelevant speech is provided by William Plummer, a Senator from New Hampshire at the time, and of the opposite political party from Burr, who recorded in his private journal that "Mr. Burr, the Vice President presides in Senate with great ease, dignity, and propriety. He preserves grand order, silence, and decorum in debate—he confines the speeches to the point."

A succinct review of the early Senate parliamentary practice was made by Senator Robert L. Owens, of Oklahoma, on February 13, 1915. He said:

"Mr. President, that was the rule of the Senate up until 1806. At that time the rules were modified so as to omit the reference to the previous question, not by putting in any rule denying the right of the previous question but merely omitting the previous question, on the broad theory that courtesy of free speech in the Senate would preclude any Member from the abuse of the courtesy of free speech extended to him by his colleagues, and would preclude a Senator from consuming the time of the Senate unduly, unfairly, or impudently, in disregard of the courtesy extended to him by his colleagues. The failure to move the previous question now is merely a matter of courtesy in this body, and carries with it, so long as it lasts, the reciprocal courtesy on behalf of those to whom this courtesy is extended that they shall not impose upon their colleagues who have extended the courtesy to them of freedom of debate or deny their courteous and long-suffering colleagues the right to a vote. Freedom of debate may not under such an interpretation be carried to the point of a garrulous abuse of the floor of the Senate by the reading of old records and endless speechmaking made against time, which has emptied the Senate Chamber and destroyed genuine debate in this body. At the time the previous question was dropped from the written rules of the Senate as a right under such written rules there had been no need for the 'previous question.' The previous question had only been moved four times and only used three times from 1789 to 1806—that is, during 17 years.

"There is no real debate in the Senate. Occasionally a Senator makes a speech that is worth listening to—occasionally, and only occasionally. The fact is that even speeches of the greatest value which are delivered on this floor have little or no audience now because of this gross abuse of the patience of the Senate, which has been brought to a point where men are no longer willing to be abused by loud-mouthed vociferation of robust-lunged partisans confessedly speaking against time in a filibuster, and are unwilling to keep their seats on this floor to listen to an endless tirade intended not to instruct the Senate, intended not to advise the Senate, intended not for legitimate debate, not for an honest exercise of freedom of speech, but for the sinister, ulterior, half-concealed purpose of killing time in the Senate and thereby preventing the Senate from acting, thus establishing a minority veto under the pretense, the bald pretense, the impudent and false pretense, of freedom of debate."

After Burr, the Vice Presidents down to the beginning of John C. Calhoun's term in 1825 apparently followed the pattern set by their predecessors. During a great part of this time, owing to deaths and illnesses of the successive Vice Presidents, John Gaillard, of South Carolina, as President pro tempore presided with great dignity and firmness over the Senate deliberations for many years. His firmness in controlling debate has specific significance as he was chosen President pro tempore again and again for a period extending more than 15 years.

During Calhoun's tenure as Vice President (1826), for reasons not beyond the suspicion of faction, the Senate lost control over debate and the deliberations became, for the first time, unseemly and chaotic. This created a crisis and brought on the debate over rules in 1828.

The crisis in Senate decorum and order was caused by John Randolph of Roanoke. Earlier he taught the House of Representatives to filibuster and caused the House to revise its precedents and change its rules to provide that a motion for the "previous question" immediately closed debate. Randolph came to the Senate in 1825 and during his 2 years as a Member of the Senate drove it to the point of desperation by endless days of talks for hours at a time without the slightest reference to the pending business, a state of affairs until then unknown to the punctilious and formal Senate. The then Vice President, John C. Calhoun—who never himself engaged in irrelevant speech—would not call Mr. Randolph to order, holding that he had no authority to call to order on a question of the latitude of debate.

Without a change in the rules the Senate was helpless to defend itself against Randolph's irrelevancies because under the rules the Presiding Officer's rulings on order and decorum in debate were final and could not be appealed. Calhoun was bitterly at odds with both President John Quincy Adams and Henry Clay, who was then Secretary of State. Randolph's tirades were directed mostly at these two men. Though he denied it, critics of Calhoun contended that he had broken with tradition and the precedents and refused to enforce the rules for partisan political reasons. In any case, charges and countercharges flew both in and out of the Congress.

In the fall of 1826 the Virginia Legislature relieved the distress of the Senate in the 20th Congress by replacing Randolph with John Tyler as one of the two Senators from Virginia. The Senate early in the 1st session of the 20th Congress set about to restore order and in February 1828 a thorough discussion of the rules governing decorum took place. It resulted in amendment of the rules to provide explicity that the Vice President had such authority on his own initiative, and made his rulings subject to appeal. In making the Vice President's ruling appealable the Senate intended two things: First, to strengthen Senate discipline by adding the weight of the majority to the decision of the Chair on questions of order when an appeal was taken; second, to provide protections against any possible arbitrariness on the part of a presiding officer.

The debate preceding the changes is of particular interest because it involved such a full discussion of Senate practices relating to order and decorum in debate. Excerpts from it are set out below:

[From Gales and Seaton's Register of Debates in Congress, 20th Cong., Feb. 11, 1828, pp. 295–296]

"Senator WILLIAM SMITH, of South Carolina. * * * It was a rule of the Senate for 35 years, for the President to call to order, and he, himself, had been the subject of it. He had been called to order by his late venerable friend, Mr. Gaillard. He had appealed to the Senate to say whether he was out of order, and the decision was, that there could be no appeal. It seemed to be assumed by some gentlemen, that they were going to place a tyrant in the chair, and that against his lawless rule it was necessary to provide. This did not produce any effect on his mind. * * * Or, suppose that a Senator were to go at length into the consideration of a subject entirely foreign to the question in hand, and talk of the Army or the Navy when the question of the proper location of a road was before the Senate? Or discuss the expediency of an appropriation, when no appropriation was contemplated? Would the Chair sit silent and permit this irrelevancy? Certainly not. If he did, an individual might talk here a whole day, and arrive at nothing. There were rules, the enforcement of which could not be taken from the Chair without making the Senate a mere nullity. It would be, in fact, throwing a new and inconvenient duty into the hands of the Members by setting them to watch over and administer the rules, which, in reality, belongs to the President. * * * He believed that every deliberative body must have a presiding officer, and that individual ought to have the requisite authority for conserving the order of the meeting, and advancing the progress of the public business."

"[From Gales and Seaton's Register of Debates in Congress, 20th Cong. Feb. 12, 1928, p. 305]

"Senator DAVID BARTON of Missouri. * * * Let me suppose, said Mr. B., that this Senate, being a permanent and continuous body of but a small number of men, had gone on, as it might have done, without any written rules at all for its government, to perform the duties imposed upon it by the Constitution, what then would have been the power and the duty of the presiding officer? The Constitution says in one brief sentence applicable to both Houses, "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." It does not say how the determination shall be made; whether the decisions of the Senate on each case as it might arise, growing up at length like the common law itself, into a code for the government of the body, shall be the rules of its proceedings; or, whether a set of arbitrary rules written a priori, and liable to be found either good or bad, upon experience, shall govern its proceedings. Either mode would be equally the determinations of the Senate, and equally obligatory on the Members and the President. Nay, sir, the long-settled practice of this body, that has gone on with the sanction of many years, might be considered a more deliberate determination of the Senate than any literal rule, even were there a literal rule to the contrary. Upon what principle is it that we daily hear the Chair declare that the unanimous consent of the Senate will dispense with a written rule, even in cases where there is no written rule to authorize such dispensation? Is it not upon the plain principle that the power that can create, can dispense with the rule? This Senate has the same right to form for itself a parliamentary law or code for its own government, that the British Parliament or any other legislative body has. Precedents made in good times were the materials of which the great system of the common law itself, so highly and so justly eulogized the other day by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Rowan] was composed. Mr. B. said, it is an axiom derived from the experience of mankind, that we are not to look for those precedents that are worthy of being followed, or of entering into a code for our guide, to times of the highest and the worst of party excitements, such as the session of 1825–26 was. He should, therefor, look beyond that epoch to the halcyon days of the predecessor of the present presiding officer, and see what he [Mr. Gaillard] did. He was placed in a situation that gave him decided advantages over the present presiding officer—a situation that gave peculiar weight and dignity to his decisions, and to the practice of the Senate under his long and benign administration. He presided in a time when the present rancor of party strife was unknown. He stood aloof, in that chair, from the parties of the day. He was not looked to as the head of any great party in this Nation, contending for rule; nor were his decisions subjected to the illiberal imputation of having any ulterior object in view. Drawing precedents, then, from those times (for his experience, he said, did not enable him to go back beyond that administration), he considered the law of the Senate clearly settled, that the vice president possessed, and ought to have exercised, the power of restraining the wholly irrelevant latitude of debate of that period, which has been so unnecessarily drawn into review upon the discussion of this amendment.

"The officer to whom he had alluded [Mr. Gaillard] was in the constant practice of preserving order in the body, by calling back a rambling Member to the subject before the Senate, when he had gone entirely from it, even in the language of the most decent and orderly style. True, he did those things in so mild and affable manner that the Member himself did not feel that he had been reproved; and the audience who witnessed the exercise of the power left the Senate Chamber without the impression that any Member had been out of order. His authority was the long practice of the Senate, sanctioning Mr. Jefferson's Manual as their parliamentary law, in conjunction with their few positive rules and practical determinations. Those long practices of the body, in its best days, with the uninterrupted sanction of the Senate, he contended, were as fair and as constitutional a determination of our rules of proceedings as if they had been written down and printed upon paper or parchment, subject to constant change, as experience should afterward either approve or condemn them. He thought, indeed, such long practice was the best mode of forming a code for the government of the Senate. He went on to instance some cases in which the present Presiding Officer had, as he thought, exercised the general power of preserving order in the cases where the written rules of the Senate were silent, as if an innumerable train of amendments should be offered consecutively to each other; and in cases of considering votes carried or rules dispensed with, where no objection was heard; all of which owed its authority to the unwritten practice or determination of the body.

"He did not think the political friends of the Vice President ought to reject the offer to the other side of this House to settle the disputed power and duty of the Chair, to restrain the irrelevant or disorderly latitude of debate, restoring, at the same time, the right of appeal to the Senate, as a check upon the decisions of the Presiding Officer. He should, therefore, give to this amendment the support of his vote.

"Senator SAMUEL BELL, of New Hampshire. The Constitution creates the office of Vice President, and expressly imposes upon him the specific duty of presiding over the deliberations of the Senate. That duty cannot be performed, either usefully or efficiently, without the power of preserving order. The power to preserve order must therefore be necessarily incident to the office. The Senate itself cannot divest the Vice President of this power, because he holds it from the Constitution; but they may enlarge, or limit, or modify it, because this power is expressly vested in the body by the Constitution. When the Constitution gives to the Vice President the power of presiding over the Senate, it refers him to the well known usages of all legislative bodies for the extent and nature of his powers and duties. It was necessary that he should be invested with this power, because it was to be exercised from the first moment the Senate assembled, and before it was possible that they could establish rules for this purpose. There could be no assignable motive why the power so universally held and exercised by the presiding officers of all other deliberative bodies, should be withholden from the Vice President, since the Constitution gives to the Senate the power of modifying the rules he should adopt, or establishing others, as this body should think fit. The Vice President is required by the Constitution to conform to, and regulate his conduct, as a presiding officer, by the rules so amended or modified. Should he, from culpable motives refuse or neglect to conform to rules so established, he would be liable to impeachment and removal from office. Every exercise of the power of preserving order, however different in character, rests on the same principle for support. When the presiding officer calls the attention of the Members to business, or commands silence, he is performing an act of preserving order, equally as when he requires a Member to adhere to the rules of decorum in debate. The same power which authorized the one, authorizes the other; any attempt to distinguish between them is destitute of even a colorable foundation.

"But should we believe that the language of the Constitution, which invests the Vice President with the power of preserving order in the Senate, to be ambiguous, has not that ambiguity been removed, and its meaning long since settled by the uniform practice of all the presiding officers of the Senate, and that, too, by the assent and approbation of the Senate? That construction of the Constitution which gives to the Vice President the power of preserving order in cases where the Senate have not established any rules, is not of modern date, nor established with a view to any temporary object, but is as old as the Constitution itself. It commenced with the existence of this Government, and was continued without interruption for 35 years. Within that time, some of the ablest men this country has ever produced have presided in the Senate. When I name Jefferson and Gaillard as of the number of those presiding officers of the Senate, who believed that the Constitution invested the Vice President with this power, no man will have occasion to blush when he admits that he holds the same opinion. These were not of that class of men who are prone to claim or exercise powers which do not legitimately belong to them.

"Mr. Jefferson, in his 'Manual,' compiled expressly for the use of the Senate, declares expressly, that the Vice President possesses this contested power and gives us to understand distinctly that such had been the uniform practice in the Senate. Mr. Gaillard was a Member of the Senate more than 20 years, and for a great length of time discharged the duties of a presiding officer in it. His character is well known to every Member of this body. It will not be denied, that, to an unassuming and discriminating mind, he united a knowledge of the rules of proceeding in legislative bodies seldom equaled. That he not only adopted, but carried into practice, constant and uniform practice, the power of preserving order in the Senate, which Mr. Jefferson affirmed, but which is now denied to be constitutionally vested in the Vice President, is known to many of the Members of this body. It is true that all these distinguished men may have entertained erroneous opinions on this question, but I cannot admit it, unless upon stronger evidence than any I have yet heard. If the question were to be settled by the authority of names—and questions seem to be sometimes so settled—it would require no ordinary weight of such authority to outweigh that of such men as I have named, and several others that I might have named. I do not contend that this is the only way in which it should be settled, but I must be permitted to say that a construction of the Constitution so long and satisfactorily settled, and by such men, should not be overturned without great deliberation and reflection upon the consequence likely to result from it. By the unexpected course which the discussion of this question has taken, I have felt myself called upon to express my opinion on this question, and the grounds of that opinion. I have done it with reluctance, and with great respect for those who entertain a different opinion. It is a question on which an honest difference of opinion may exist, and as such it should be considered and treated. I do not feel any deep interest in the adoption of the amendment under consideration; yet, as I believe it will conduce to the better preservation of order under the present construction of the powers of the Presiding Officer of the Senate, I will give it my support."

"Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Senator from South Carolina. For his own part, he never had a doubt but that the President of the Senate had the right to call to order. The very nature of his office implies that power. He was not one of those who relied upon constructive powers where they were not expressly given, but in this case he had the invariable practice of the Senate, from its commencement in 1789, up to the session of 1825, a term of 36 years, to sanction this opinion. He recollected very well that he had himself been called to order by the President of the Senate, more than once. On one occasion, a gentleman in the chair [Mr. Gaillard] for whose memory he entertained the most profound respect, had called him to order for words spoken in debate, when he, Mr. S. himself, conceived he was correct, which induced him to appeal to the Senate, and was again told by the Chair, there was no appeal from his decision; and the Senate supported the Chair.

"It is the invariable practice of the Presiding Officer in every legislative body in the United States, to keep order in their respective bodies, and if a member wanders from the question in debate, to call him to order.

"If the uninterrupted practice of the Senate for the first 36 years of its existence, for the President, in all cases, and more especially if a Member wander from the question before the Senate, in debate, to call him to order, and bring him back to that question, can weigh anything, or if the analogy of the universal usage in all other legislative bodies, and all public assemblies whatever, that look to their presiding officers to perform the office of calling to order, as an official duty, can have any weight in bringing us to a fair conclusion, we cannot doubt but that it belongs to the Chair, ex vi termini, to call to order. What higher duty can be required of the Chair? Merely putting the question upon bills and resolutions is certainly a minor duty. Such a duty as could well be discharged by an additional Clerk, as the reading is now by the Secretary.

"One gentleman had said, there was 48 Senators in this House, either of whom could call to order. It is admitted. But suppose any one Senator should so far forget himself as to make in the course of his argument indecorous and unkind remarks upon any other Member to whom he might be opposed that were foreign to the subject before the Senate; could it be expected that the Member assailed would rise to call the other to order in his own defense? There is no man of delicate sensibility who would do so. It would be a task too invidious for a Member who was not assailed, to take up the subject. And to what extravagance would it not lead, were the President to fold his arms and sit silent? Or suppose the question before the Senate to be upon an appropriation for a turnpike road, and a Senator should rise in his place, and address the Chair upon the subject of an Indian treaty, or upon a naval expedition, for an hour, without once touching the subject submitted by the Chair, for the consideration of the Senate; could the President of the Senate sit in dignified silence? It is impossible to imagine he would.

"[From Debates in Congress, 20th Cong., 1st sess., 1827–28, vol. 4, pt. 1, pp. 318–319, 322]

"Mr. EZEKIEL F. CHAMBERS, Senator from Maryland: * * * Then we are in this dilemma: We have rules, but no one has authority to call them into action. Our predecessors must have differed widely from ourselves on these matters, or they have applied their time and their talents to small account. The illustrious author of this book ('Jefferson's Manual') had intimated a very different opinion on this subject. He had prepared and presented to the Senate for their use a parliamentary rule, sanctioned by its usage for more than 200 years, which pointed to the Presiding Officer as the individual to move in questions of order. He then alluded to what had been called by the honorable gentleman from Delaware [Mr. McLane] and he must be permitted to think very incorrectly called, inherent power. If the honorable gentleman had reference to power of the Presiding Officer, not derived from the Constitution or laws of the United States, or rules of the Senate, he knew of none such, and utterly denied that they existed. If, on the contrary, he had reference to powers derived from these sources, he could not well perceive with what propriety the term 'inherent' could be applied to them.

* * * * *

"With the conviction of the constitutional existence of these powers in the Presiding Officer, and an entire willingness to rely on their exercise, the Senate, at an early period, 'formed,' to use Mr. Jefferson's language, some rules for its own government, but these going only a few cases, they have referred to the decision of their President, without debate and without appeal, all questions of order arising under their own rules, or where they have provided none: thus placing 'under his discretion,' as he continues, 'a very extensive field of decision.'

"On some of the plainest as well as the most important items of legislative order, the Senate had no written rule whatever. He believed in every legislative body it was held necessary to restrain the speaker from subjects wholly and obviously foreign and irrelevant to the matter in hand. But yet, unless it had eluded his research, there was no written rule of the Senate to secure this necessary result. Not one word on the subject. If he were now to leave the subject of the rules and practice of this body, and indulge himself in a history of the beauty, the splendor, and the utility, of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, he would deny the authority of any individual in this Chamber, whether President or Member, to charge upon him a violation of order, on the hypothesis, that the lex scripta is the only rule of this House. If the lex non scripta, if anything beside the Constitution, laws of Congress, or written rules of the Senate could restrain me, I ask (said Mr. C.), where is it found, and when found I ask, does it confine the primary call to the Member, and refuse it to the President except on appeal? This is the question, and we must not lose sight of it, and gentlemen will find the same argument which proves the authority of the Member, proves the authority of the President; and if they deny the authority of either or both, they leave us in a miserable condition, totally unable to secure the preservation of order or decorum at all. This is a state of things from which we wish to escape, and the interesting inquiry is, by what mode can we do so?

"Mr. JOSIAH S. JOHNSTON, Senator of Louisiana. I believe the right of calling to order, preserving order, and deciding on all questions of order, belongs to the Presiding Officer. The Chair declines to exercise the power. [The Vice President rose and explained, that he stated specifically that he did call to order in all cases, except for words spoken.] I take the distinction of the Chair. As far as the decision goes it is correct. But it supports the very argument I have endeavored to maintain—that power by which you call to order in any case, which you distinguish as ministerial, is by virtue of a right inherent in the office. There is no rule that vests that power, in any case, in the Chair. But assuming that power, how is the distinction taken between those cases, where you can act from cases of disorder arising from words spoken? There is none in the rules. The distinction seems to be artificial. My mind cannot perceive the criterion on which the discrimination is made. The delicacy which declines the exercise of power, because it is doubtful, is meritorious. But I am sure the Chair will never avail itself of the pretense which has been urged in this debate, that the surrender of power is favorable to liberty. Power is delegated to be exercised for the security of liberty. Liberty depends not on its being without limits and without control, but on its being regulated. The power of the Presiding Officer is necessary to the despatch of business, and the order and dignity of the body. To release every Member from the restraints of the rules, and restore him his liberty to say and do what he pleases, instead of being favorable, will be fatal to liberty. It is not liberty in that sense for which Government was instituted; it was regulated liberty secured by law (pp. 336-337)."

Randolph's role as the precursor of the modern filibuster is further indicated in Dr. Franklin L. Burdette's book "Filibustering in the Senate." On page 16 he says:

"In any event, it seems likely that there were no major or extended filibusters in the dignified Senate prior to the advent of the remarkable John Randolph of Roanoke."

On page 19 he says:

"One is inclined strongly to suspect that the Senate's first extended and spectacular filibusters were staged by that southern opponent of the Adamses [John Randolph]. * * * If men filibustered in the years immediately following, they at least did so with gravity and beneath the cloak of relevancy."

Eighteen hundred and twenty-nine through eighteen hundred and forty-one

Not until 1837 was there another serious attempt at filibustering. In that year the opponents of the resolution to expunge from the Senate records the 1834 resolution of censure against President Jackson attempted an "incipient filibuster," in the words of Dr. Burdette. But an incipient filibuster is far short of the object of our attention today.

In the course of debate on July 3, 1840, Senator Oliver H. Smith of Indiana, called Senator Tappan to order—in the words of the editor of the debates—"for digressing from the question immediately before the Senate." The Chair ruled Senator Tappan out of order and he agreed that the entire debate was out of order. This appears at page 504 of volume 8 of the Congressional Globe.

A few minutes later Senator Robert Strange of North Carolina, speaking of the Senate rules said:

"When we met here at the beginning of this session, we adopted the rules lying upon our tables (p. 505, id.)

"And thereafter Senator Albert S. White, of Indiana, is quoted as follows:

"Mr. White said that the rules of the Senate were adopted every session, and the same power which adopted could modify or abrogate them at its pleasure. It had been frequently asserted in the discussion that the rules of the body were designed for the protection of the minority. This he denied. The protection thus afforded was only incidental. They were framed for the regulation of our proceedings and the guidance of our Presiding Officer."

Neither Senator was refuted by anyone at the time or thereafter.

I do not attach any particular significance to these remarks but perhaps those who contend that the Senate is a continuous body in all respects may want to ponder them.

A list of outstanding filibusters contained in Limitation of Debate in the U.S. Senate, by Dr. George B. Galloway, begins with the year 1841. I submit that a close study of the course of the debate on the rechartering of the National Bank in that year will not leave one convinced that a genuine filibuster occurred—at least not the destructive kind I am talking about. In fact, the bank bill passed and was vetoed by President Tyler. In speaking of this debate, Dr. Burdette said in his book at page 24:

"Not yet was filibusterism so organized that it could completely paralyze the program of the Senate."

That 1841 debate is significant, however, in supporting my main contention that the gentlemen of the old school of the pre-Civil War days, did not and could not under the Senate rules and precedents filibuster.

At various stages of the debate Henry Clay complained that the Democrats were engaging in protracted talk and were delaying the progress of the Senate's business. In answer to these charges John C. Calhoun and other Senators were vigorous in their denial of dilatory speech and also affirmed the traditions of the Senate for pertinent speech in the dispatch of public business. Excerpts from their remarks are given here:

"John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, * * * but he must express his hope that the Senator would not depart from that generous, liberal, and courteous habit of proceeding, which was the real honor of the Senate. Very rarely was such a thing witnessed as the attempt to thwart a measure by the mere consumption of time, or by a resort to the technicality of rules. Seldom has it been attempted to stop debate by sitting out the question * * * (June 12, 1841, vol. 10, Congressional Globe, p. 46).

"It was not his intention, and he knew it could not be the intention of any of his friends, to waste unnecessarily one particle of the time of this session; but time they would require to amend the bill, and that was all they asked. Certain he was, that no other than a fair and open opposition, on principle, was meant. As long as discussion was necessary, they should have it—beyond that, they did not look (July 12, 1841, vol. 10, Congressional Globe, p. 184).

"There never had been a body in this or any other country, in which, for such a length of time, so much dignity and decorum of debate had been maintained. It was remarkable for the fact the range of discussion was less discursive than in any other similar body known. Speeches were uniformly confined to the subject under debate (July 15, 1841, vol. 10, Congressional Globe, p. 205).

"WILLIAM R. KING, of Alabama. Nobody on his side of the House wished to see the session prolonged; all concurred, he was sure, in desiring an early period of adjournment. Mr. K. never had concurred in any attempt to defeat measures by mere delay. * * *

"WILLIAM ALLEN, of Ohio. I have ever been unwilling to break the silence of the body (the Senate) for the mere purpose of talking * * * (June 12, 1841).

"THOMAS HART BENTON, of Missouri. With respect to debates, Senators have a constitutional right to speak; and while they speak to the subject before the House, there is no power any where to stop them. It is a constitutional right. When a member departs from the question, he is to be stopped: it is the duty of the Chair—your duty, Mr. President, to stop him—and it is the duty of the Senate to sustain you in the discharge of this duty. We have rules for conducting the debates, and these rules only require to be enforced in order to make debates decent and instructive in their import, and brief and reasonable in their duration. The Government has been in operation above 50 years, and the freedom of debate has been sometimes abused, especially during the last 12 years, when those out of power made the two Houses of Congress the arena of political and electioneering combat against the Democratic administration in power. The liberty of debate was abused during this time; but the Democratic majority would not impose gags and muzzles on the mouths of the minority; they would not stop their speeches; considering, and justly considering, that the privilege of speech was inestimable and inattackable—that some abuse of it was inseparable from its enjoyment—and that it was better to endure a temporary abuse than to incur a total extinction of this great privilege.

"But, sir, debate is one thing, and amendments another. A long speech, wandering off from the bill, is a very different thing from a short amendment, directed to the texture of the bill itself, and intended to increase its beneficial, or to diminish its prejudicial, action. These amendments are the point to which I now speak, and to the nature of which I particularly invoke the attention of the Senate."

At the end of the session Clay and Calhoun and King engaged in the following colloquy:

"Mr. Calhoun hoped the country would now be satisfied that there had been gross delusion in the attempt made to throw all the blame of delaying the business of this extra session on the opposition. On Saturday week he (Mr. Calhoun) and his friends proposed to take the final vote on the succeeding Monday; and who had delayed the bill ever since? Was it not the gentlemen themselves? But further delay is now asked for amendments that have been gone over twice already—in the Senate and in committee—with all the consideration that could be given to them. It was now surely obvious that the consent of the Senate had gone as far as the Senator from Kentucky could expect. The Senate was now full, and no good reason could be urged why the vote should not be taken on the engrossment, with a view of coming to the final vote tomorrow.

"Mr. Clay of Kentucky said there was such a thing as a ruse de guerre. He would put it to the candor of the gentlemen on the other side to say if such was not the case in the proposition made on Saturday week to go to the final vote on the succeeding Monday. He (Mr. Clay) was, however, willing to admit that his side of the Senate had occupied its share of time; but it was hardly fair to charge him and his friends with the whole of the delay. The gentlemen themselves, in 1 day, had made seven speeches in succession. But he would not now go into these matters. He had risen to say he would propose to the gentlemen to take the question tomorrow, at 12 o'clock, without debate.

"Mr. King said he had understood, when he made the proposition on Saturday week to take the question on the succeeding Monday, that the ostensible reason for delay arose out of the absence of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Graham] but knowing that could make no difference, he had acted in good faith; for he believed it was by arrangement that that Senator and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Rives], who was understood to be opposed to the bill, were both absent, having paired off, so that they could, without affecting the vote on this bill, attend to the necessary call for their absence. Why, they, if the gentlemen opposite were in earnest in their proclaimed desire of coming to the vote on the Bank bill—why did they introduce their loan bill, and their bankrupt bill, not to interfere, but for the purpose of delaying the final vote on this Bank bill? As to the imputation that the amendments offered by his (Mr. King's) friends were intended to embarrass the measure, he could with confidence say that there was not one of these amendments which had not been offered in good faith.

"The Senator from Kentucky had alluded to the number of speches made in defense of these amendments by the Senators in the opposition; but the Senator seemed to forget that he himself had made nearly as many speeches as the whole of them put together. He and his friends had consumed by far the greater part of the time devoted to the discussion of this bill. The Senator has the command of a sufficient majority. He has been offered the immediate opportunity of acting with that majority. What, then, can be the reason that, instead of acting at once, further delay is asked for on the pretense of having more amendments to offer? He (Mr. King) now wanted the country to understand truly who it was that was causing the delay of business in this extra session of Congress. He wished the country to understand that the cause of delay does not rest with the minority."

Eighteen hundred and forty-six through eighteen hundred and fifty-six

The next outstanding filibuster listed by Dr. Galloway occurred in 1846. The debate over this bill, relating to the Oregon territorial dispute with Great Britain, lasted about 2 months but the bill did pass. The issue was of great importance to the Nation and many Senators on both sides wanted to make their views known. Though therefore protracted, the debate as recorded in the Congressional Globe was always relevant. Time was spent but the Senate was not frustrated. As the excerpts that follow indicate, the speaking was not for the purpose of deliberately delaying action by the Senate.

Senator William Allen of Ohio, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, while opposed to the particular legislation, was nonetheless responsible for its progress as floor manager. In discharge of his responsibilities, on March 24, 1846, in the words of the editor of Globe, Mr. Allen—

"Rose and said he desired to ask the attention of the Senate to the question of determining upon what day the Senate would be willing to take the vote upon the passage of the Oregon resolution. It was now, he believed, 40 or 50 days since the debate upon this subject was opened. How the intervening time had been consumed was known to all. He had no personal right to complain of the time consumed by other Senators in the discussion, after having himself consumed 2 days of the time of the Senate; but he desired, for many reasons which it would not be necessary for him to state to the Senate, that there should be some day fixed, by a general understanding, on which to bring the discussion on the subject of the notice to a conclusion. He desired that the day should be made known, if practicable, before the arrival of the day itself, in order to accommodate those of his fellow Senators who were compelled by circumstances to absent themselves for a short time, and who had named to him the necessity which existed for such absence, and who strongly desired to be present when the vote was to be taken upon this important question. By fixing the day many of those gentlemen might probably regulate their absence so as to be present on that day. By leaving the time entirely indefinite, the Senate might suddenly come to a vote, to the surprise and mortification of those who chanced to be absent; and to this extent injustice would be done to those Senators.

"He named these circumstances without naming the still greater and more important considerations connected with the great interests of the country. After some 3 or 4 months devoted to the consideration of this subject in the two Houses of Congress, it seemed to him that the Senate ought to be able to fix some day, and that not a remote one, when the sense of the Senate could be taken upon the subject. He was aware that the previous question was not in use here; he was aware it was not the habit of the Senate to pass a resolution to take a subject out of discussion, and to direct the vote to be taken on a given day; but he was likewise aware that it had been their habit to have a conversational understanding that an end would be put to a protracted debate at a particular time. It was with this object that he now rose, and he would name Saturday next as the day on which the vote should be taken. This would leave sufficient time for the exposition of the views of those Senators who still desired to be heard upon the subject. He made this proposition in order that Senators might not be taken by surprise. Much had been said about quieting the apprehension of the country. He had never indulged in that description of remark, and he thought it was entirely out of place as connected with the subject to which his proposition now had reference. He made that proposition with a view of obtaining, if practicable, a general understanding as to the time when the vote should be taken.

"Mr. Morehead said he did not know to what extent the practice to which the honorable Senator had alluded had prevailed in the Senate, to fix some given day for the decision of a pending question. Even if there was a rule of this kind, or a practice which amounted to a rule, he trusted it would not be applied to a question like that which had been under discussion for several weeks past. It was, he believed, generally regarded as the most important question which had attracted the attention of Congress for many years. He could not perceive the necessity for fixing any particular day when the question must be decided; for if they were to do so, they might, to some extent, while aiming to promote the convenience of some Members of the Senate, inflict a very great inconvenience upon other Members by depriving them of the opportunity of delivering their views upon the question. That, he was sure, was not the object of the honorable Senator. It seemed to him, therefore, in view of the well-known courtesies of the Senate—of the well ascertained disposition of that body never, at any time, to press the vote upon any question when any considerable number were absent; and, regarding the well-known disposition which prevailed on all occasions to consult the convenience of Senators, it seemed to him that it would be quite safe to trust to that courtesy that the Senate would not, in the absence of any of its Members, insist upon a vote, or take any proceeding that would disoblige or prove a source of embarrassment or inconvenience to any. He supposed there were various Senators who yet desired to make some observations upon the subject. Being one, and the humblest of the body, and the least disposed to throw himself upon the indulgence of the Senate at any time, he should nevertheless feel disposed before the debate closed to submit his views to the Senate. There were Senators who might desire to be heard who were not present this morning, and, therefore, he would suggest to the honorable Senator from Ohio not to press his proposition, but to allow it to lie over until tomorrow.

"Mr. Allen observed that he would not protract the discussion at this time, because he was unwilling to consume the time which rightfully belonged to his honorable friend from Mississippi, [Mr. Chalmers]. His object in calling the attention of the Senate to the subject was, that Senators might reflect upon it, and unite in some informal understanding respecting the time for closing the debate."

On March 26, Senator Allen again touched on the subject of coming to a vote:

The debate on Oregon

"Mr. Allen rose and said, that if there were no more reports to be made, he desired the indulgence of the Senate, while he recurred to some observations which he had made 2 days ago, in reference to an informal understanding that the Senate would on a certain day proceed to vote upon the passage of the Oregon resolutions. The suggestions which he had offered on a former occasion were made with a view of attracting the attention of Senators to the question of fixing a definite day on which the vote might be taken. Subsequently to that time he had had an opportunity of ascertaining the views of many Senators on this subject, and he believed he might very safely express the hope that the Senate would proceed to vote on the question on Friday week, with a view to the final settlement of it by a vote of this body. This, it would be admitted, would afford ample time for the fullest discussion of the question by those who desired to discuss it. And he would suggest, though it was a matter which was of course altogether within the power of the Senate, and in which he had no more right to have his wishes consulted than any other single Senator, still he would suggest, that, in order to afford the amplest opportunity to the Senators who had not yet spoken to deliver their views, the Senate continue to sit the whole week out.

"There was some excuse for asking the attention of the Senate to this matter, and it was found in the fact that there must of necessity be a definite period for the termination of the discussion. There was some excuse to be found in the fact that many Senators, in consequence of peculiar circumstances, would, after the next 10 days, be compelled to be absent from the body for some time, and all were anxious to be present when the vote was to be taken upon so important a question. He merely threw out these suggestions. Of course the Senate would act as they saw fit. He thought it proper, however, to suggest what he believed to be the prevalent opinion of the body as to the time for taking the vote on the question.

"Mr. J. M. Clayton said that he concurred with the Senator from Ohio that some time should be fixed for the termination of the debate, and he would be perfectly satisfied that the vote should be taken upon the day which the Senator had named. He was aware that many Senators, who would be reluctant to be absent when the vote was to be taken, would be compelled to be away for a time from the Senate. He had no desire whatever to prevent any Senator who desired to address the body upon the question from doing so; but he thought the time named by the Senator from Ohio was a reasonable time, and sufficient to allow every Senator an opportunity to express his views. He did not know that any debate which could now take place would change the opinion of a single Member of that body; still he was anxious to give everyone an opportunity to be heard. He could not conceive, after all that had been said, that it was possible that any benefit could be derived from protracting the debate beyond the time mentioned by the Senator from Ohio. He did not know what the proper mode was, whether by resolution or by a general understanding; he rose only for the purpose of saying that he, for one, was satisfied with the time named by the Senator.

"Mr. Allen said he had stated what he understood the practice of the Senate to be. It was known to Senators that the previous question was not in use, and it had never been the practice to introduce a resolution for fixing the time for terminating a debate. This was a practice which had grown up elsewhere, but had never been introduced into the Senate; the practice was to have an informal understanding, and to carry it out, by refusing to adjourn until the question was taken.

"Mr. Niles said he concurred in the remarks of both the honorable Senators who had just spoken. He was not in favor of curtailing debate upon any question especially upon one of great national importance like the present. At the same time Senators must be aware that it is necessary that the debate should be brought to a close; and it seemed to him that the termination of the discussion might reasonably be fixed for the day mentioned by the Senator from Ohio. The subject had been before the two Houses for a long time. In the British Parliament they denominated a debate which lasted 12 nights a 'monster debate;' this might, with great propriety, he thought, be styled a 'monster debate,' as it had lasted nearly 2 months, and had exercised an influence on the business affairs of the country. It appeared, therefore, to him, that it was very proper that the present undefined position of the subject should be changed by taking a vote. He thought the debate should be brought to a close at as early a day as that named by the Senator from Ohio, and, that every Senator who had not yet expressed his views might have an opportunity to do so, he for one would submit to any degree of personal inconvenience, and would be disposed to sit on the 2 days in the week on which the Senate was in the habit of adjourning, and to hear two speeches a day.

"Mr. Jarnagin said there was no proposition, he believed, before the Senate to adjourn over; and he would remark that he saw no probability of such a motion being made in the present state of the debate, which, he trusted, would be allowed to proceed until those who had not yet had an opportunity to address the Senate might have an opportunity to do so, and then the vote could be taken. There was no precedent, he believed, in that body, for limiting debate to a given period. There was no precedent for urging forward the close of a debate to such an extent that two speeches must be delivered in 1 day. Some gentlemen had taken 2 days for a single speech; and, having said all they purposed saying, were now anxious to hasten the debate to a close. He, for one, did not purpose addressing the Senate upon the Oregon question; but he now entered his protest against the adoption of any rule or practice by which debate should be stifled in that body. Gentlemen might determine for themselves upon a motion to adjourn; whether it were expedient to do so without having a rule to govern them. He did not understand the Senator from Ohio as proposing anything further than to bring the matter to the notice of Senators individually. But they were told that it was necessary to put an end to the debate; that it was highly proper to have a day fixed in their own minds for its termination. That was a matter which he protested against. And he would take occasion to say that, for one, he was ready to vote now, and had been ready for 2 or 3 weeks past. But when all who desired it had had an opportunity to address the Senate, it would be time enough to take the vote.

"Mr. Woodbridge said he did not hold to the expediency of adopting any artificial rule in this case; when gentlemen had had the opportunity, which they ought to have, of addressing the Senate, it would be time enough for the Senate to act. There were two Senators absent, and he knew they would be extremely desirous of being present when the vote was taken. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Huntington], and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Simmons], the latter of whom, he believed, was desirous of expressing his views on the subject, were both absent. Though he was desirous that the debate should be brought to a close, yet he was also desirous of giving to every gentleman an opportunity of discussing the question if he desired it.

"Mr. Hannegan said if he had rightly understood the Senator from Ohio, and he was confident that he had, the Senator had proposed no rule, as he was represented by the Senator from Tennessee to have done. The Senator from Ohio simply suggested to the Senate the propriety of determining informally that on tomorrow week the question should be taken. The Senator did not propose to adopt a resolution or to fasten a rule upon the Senate from which there should be no departure; but he simply proposed, as an act of courtesy to the Senators present and to those who were absent, that the time for taking the vote should be known beforehand, that no one might be taken unawares. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. Woodbridge] suggested the absence of the Senator from Connecticut. If the health of that Senator were such as to permit him to be present, he would have timely notice; but if, as he had reason to believe, his health would not admit of his attendance, was the action of the Senate to be suspended on that account in a matter of this kind? He was not for preventing any Senator from expressing his views, but he held that the 9 days which would intervene between this morning and the day named by the Senator from Ohio would be amply sufficient. There were gentlemen on this side of the Chamber who, though they had spoken, would like to say more, but who were willing to waive their privilege in order that this protracted debate might be brought to a close. He thought it was due to the country that the Senate should come to some conclusion upon this subject."

On April 11 Senator Allen again spoke:

"Termination of the debate

"Mr. Allen rose and remarked that he thought it might be assumed as tolerably certain that some time within the present week the Senate would proceed to vote on the Oregon resolutions. This being the case, he was of the opinion that it would be an accommodation to many Senators to have an understanding as to the exact day on which the Senate would proceed to vote upon them. And he would here state that it was his intention when they came to the vote to move to lay upon the table the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and to take up that which was sent to them from the House of Representatives, in order to test the sense of the Senate upon that resolution. He was desirous that a day should be determined on, inasmuch as some of the Members of the body would be unavoidably absent, he understood, within a few days, and they would like to time their absence so that it should not fall on that day when the vote should be taken.

"Mr. R. JOHNSON. Does the Senator name a day?

"Mr. ALLEN. I would propose that it be Wednesday next, or Thursday, if the Senators prefer it.

"Mr. Morehead said that for one he had not the slightest objection to fixing upon some day for terminating the debate, provided it was not to be regarded as establishing a precedent.

"[Mr. Webster here intimated that such was not the intention.]

"Mr. M. was quite willing, then, that Thursday should be the day. He would remind the Senator, however, that discussion might arise on the various propositions by way of amendment to the resolution of notice, which would preclude the possibility of taking the final vote on that day.

"Mr. R. Johnson presumed that any gentleman desiring to speak on Thursday would not be cut off by this arrangement.

"Mr. HANNEGAN. Certainly not. But the Senate may refuse to adjourn.

"Mr. Allen stated that it was not proposed to establish any arbitrary rule, which would be contrary to the practice of the Senate. Nor was it his desire to interfere with the rights or wishes of any Senator who might desire to speak. But every Senator could resolve in his own mind that the debate should terminate, and not to adjourn before a vote was taken.

"Mr. WEBSTER. I have no objection.

"Mr. Allen then suggested that Wednesday might be fixed on.

"Mr. WEBSTER. Thursday.

"Mr. Allen acquiesced, and named Thursday.

"Mr. Moorehead suggested that a discussion, after the first vote, might arise on the various amendments, and the debate might thus be protracted beyond the day named.

"Mr. WEBSTER. Such debate would be short.

"Mr. ALLEN. It is not likely that a discussion on the amendments would be a very protracted one. After a debate of such length, every Senator must have pretty clearly determined, in his own mind, as to the form of notice for which he will vote. As regards myself, such is my unwillingness to put off the final vote on this question that I will waive my right to reply to any remarks made during the discussion, reserving the privilege to answer on some occasion which may present itself hereafter. When a running discussion arises, it has been the usual practice of the Senate to sit it out; otherwise, we should no sooner see land than we might be at sea again.

"Here the conversation dropped."

Finally, on April 16, the Senate came to a vote, but first Senator Allen said:

"Mr. Allen then rose and said, that five-and-sixty-days ago, he had opened this discussion. In the intervening debate, many things had been said to which he could desire an opportunity to reply. But in view of the public interests, as well as with a becoming regard to the patience of the Senate, he would not longer protract the discussion, by a speech which might have the effect of reopening it altogether. He should waive any right that he might have to reply to arguments urged against those presented by him, or to observations which had been made in the course of the discussion, directed more against him personally than the positions which he had assumed. He should therefore fulfill the promise made by him to the Senate a few days ago, by now moving to lay upon the table the resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the accompanying proposition of amendment, with the view of now proceeding to the consideration of the resolution sent to the body from the House of Representatives, entitled 'A joint resolution of notice to Great Britain, to annul and abrogate the convention,' and so forth. This motion he made, not because he preferred the House resolution to that reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations. The very fact of having acquiesced in that resolution, and reported it, was a declaration of his own preference for it, as reported, and also of the preference of a majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations. But he should, nevertheless, make the motion to take up the House resolution first, because upon that resolution the Senate was obliged to act; and secondly, because although the latter clause of that resolution was objectionable to him, he was willing to vote for it as it stood, in deference to the House of Representatives, who had sent it there by so large and overwhelming a vote; and still farther, because the adoption of that resolution as it stood, by putting an end to the matter, would, in all probability, be followed by the sanction and signature of the President; whereas, if amended, and reported back, of if they passed the resolution of the Committee on Foreign Relations the whole matter would be again sent to the House, and the question exposed to the danger of delay from a renewal of the discussion there, probably resulting in a conflict between the two Houses themselves as to the form of the notice. These, then, were the reasons which induced him to offer the motion which he now made."

One indication that Senate tradition was holding firm through the 1840's was the action of the Presiding Officer on July 5, 1848, in ruling Senator Clayton, of Delaware, out of order for speaking on matters not pending before the Senate. Senator Clayton at first appealed the decision but after discussion withdrew it.

Again on August 12 of the same session the Chair by a vote of 27 to 2 was overruled on an appeal from a ruling that a Senator had not been irrelevant in his remarks. This was indeed a strong demonstration that the Senate meant to live by its rules.

On April 3, 1850, Vice President Fillmore took occasion to address the Senate on the subject of decorum in debate. He reviewed the rules relating to debate in its various aspects and traced the precedents on the subject. His remarks and those of Senator William R. King, of Alabama, who presided over the Senate during the 31st and 32d Congresses as President pro tempore after Fillmore's elevation to the Presidency on June 10, 1850, follow:

"Decorum in debate"[8]

"The VICE PRESIDENT. There being no further morning business, the Chair claims the indulgence of the Senate to submit a few remarks in relation to his own powers and duties to preserve order.

"On assuming the responsible duty as Presiding Officer of this body, I trusted that no occasion would arise when it would become necessary for the Chair to interpose to preserve order in debate. I could not disguise the fact that, by possibility, such a necessity might arise. I therefore inquired of some of the Senators to know what had been the usage on this subject, and was informed that the general practice had been, since Mr. Calhoun acted as Vice President, not to interfere unless a question of order was made by some Senator. I was informed that that distinguished and now lamented person had declined to exercise the power of calling to order for words spoken in debate, on the ground that he had no authority to do so. Some thought the rule had been since changed, and others not; but then there still seemed to be a difference of opinion as to the power. Under these circumstances, though my opinion was strongly in favor of the power, with or without the rule to authorize it, I thought it most prudent not hastily to assume the exercise of it, but to wait until the course of events should show that it was necessary. It appears to me that that time has now arrived, and that the Senate should know my opinion on this subject, and the powers which, after mature reflection, I think are vested in the Chair, and the corresponding duties which they impose. If I am wrong in the conclusion at which I have arrived, I desire the advice of the Senate to correct me. I therefore think it better to state them now, when there is the opportunity for a cool and dispassionate examination, rather than wait until they are called into action by some scene of excitement which may be unfavorable to dispassionate deliberation and advice; for while I should shrink from no responsibilities which the office with which I am honored imposes upon me, I would most scrupulously avoid the assumption of any power not conferred by the Constitution and rules of this body.

"The question then presents itself, 'Has the Vice President, as Presiding Officer of this body, the power to call a Senator to order for words spoken in debate?'

"The sixth rule of the Senate is in the following words:

" 'When a Member shall be called to order by the President or a Senator, he shall sit down, and every question of order shall be decided by the President without debate, subject to an appeal to the Senate; and the President may call for the sense of the Senate on any question of order.'

"It will be seen that this rule does not expressly confer the power of calling to order either upon the President or a Senator, but impliedly admits that power in each, and declares the consequences of such call.

"The constitutional provisions bearing upon this subject are very brief. The first is:

" 'The Vice President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, and shall have no vote unless they be equally divided.'

"The next is:

" 'Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member.'

"The first clause which I have quoted, confers no express powers, yet the general powers and duties of a Presiding Officer, in a parliamentary debate, were well understood by the framers of the Constitution, and it can hardly be doubted that they intended to confer upon the Vice President those powers, and required of him the performance of those duties. But the power expressly conferred to make rules to regulate its proceedings, clearly conferred upon the Senate authority to make rules regulating the conduct of its Members, including its Presiding Officer. What, then, are we to understand from this rule?

"I have availed myself of the leisure afforded by the last recess, to look into the history of this rule, that I might, if possible, gather from it the intent of the Senate in adopting it. I find that one of the first acts of this body, in 1789, was to appoint a committee to prepare a system of rules for conducting business in the Senate.

"The committee reported a number of rules, which were adopted, and among the rest the two following:

" 'Sixteenth. When a Member shall be called to order, he shall sit down until the President shall have determined whether he is in order or not. Every question of order shall be decided by the President without debate; and if there be a doubt in his mind, he may call for a sense of the Senate.

" 'Seventeenth. If a Member be called to order for words spoken, the exceptionable words shall be immediately taken down in writing, that the President may be better enabled to judge of the matter.'

"These rules remained the same until 1828; but in 1826, Mr. Calhoun, then Vice President, declared that, in his opinion, he had no authority to call a Senator to order for words spoken in debate. In 1828, the rules were referred to a committee for revision, and were reported without any amendment to these rules; but when they came up for consideration in the Senate, they were amended so as to read as they now do, namely:

" 'Sixth. When a Member shall be called to order by the President of the Senate, he shall sit down; and every question of order shall be decided by the President without debate, subject to an appeal to the Senate; and the President may call for the sense of the Senate on any question or order.

" 'Seventh. If a Member be called to order by a Senator for words spoken, the exceptionable words shall immediately be taken down in writing, that the President may be better enabled to judge of the matter.'

"It will be seen by the comparison, that the proposed rule expressly recognized the authority in the President to call to order, and gave an appeal from his decision, which the former rules did not.

"It also made a distinction between a call to order for words spoken by the President, and by a Senator for words spoken, by requiring in the latter case that the objectionable words should be reduced to writing, but not in the former. On this amendment, a long and interesting debate sprung up, which may be found in Gales and Seaton's Register of Debates, volume 4, part 1, pages 278 to 341; and in this debate, though Senators differed widely as to the power of the President to call to order without the amendment, and as to the policy of adopting it, yet all seemed to conclude that, if adopted, he would have less power, and the amendment was finally agreed to by a vote of more than 2 to 1; and thereupon it is reported that Mr. Calhoun—

" 'The Vice President then rose and said that he took this opportunity to express his entire satisfaction with that portion of the amendment giving to Senators the right of appeal from the decision of the Chair, as it was not only according to strict principle, but would relieve the Chair from a most delicate duty. As to the power conferred upon the Chair, it was not for him to speak, but he assured the Senate that he should always endeavor to exercise it with strict impartiality.'

"It appears to me, then, with all due respect to the opinions of others, that this rule recognized the power to call to order in the Vice President, and, by implication at least, conferred that power upon him.

"The next question is, Does the possession of the power impose any duty to exercise it?

"The power, it will be seen, is conferred equally upon the Chair and every Member of the Senate, and in precisely the same language. Is the duty, then, more imperative upon the President than upon any and every Member of the Senate, to perform the unpleasant but necessary task of exercising it? There is a marked distinction between this rule and the corresponding rule of the House of Representatives. By the 22d rule of that body, a Member may call to order, but it is made the imperative duty of the Speaker to do so. The words are:

" 'If any Member in speaking or otherwise transgresses the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any Member may, call to order,' and so forth.

"It is perhaps to be regretted, if the Senate desires that its Presiding Officer should perform this delicate and ungracious duty, that its rule had not been equally explicit with that of the House.

"The reason why Senators so seldom interfere by calling each other to order, is doubtless because they fear that their motives may be misunderstood. They do not like to appear as volunteers in the discharge of such an invidious duty. The same feeling must, to some extent, operate upon the Chair, unless his duty be palpable. But upon mature reflection, I have come to the conclusion, though the authority be the same, yet that the duty may be more imperative upon the Chair than upon the Senate, and that if the painful necessity shall hereafter arise, I shall feel bound to discharge my duty accordingly. I shall endeavor to do it with the utmost impartiality and respect. I know how difficult it is to determine what is and what is not in order, to restrain improper language, and yet not abridge the freedom of debate. But all must see how important it is that the first departure from the strict rule of parliamentary decorum be checked, as a slight attack, or even insinuation of a personal character, often provokes a more severe retort, which brings out a more disorderly reply, each Senator feeling a justification in the previous aggression. There is, therefore, no point so proper to interpose for the preservation of order as to check the first violation of it.

"If, in my anxiety to do this, I should sometimes make a mistake, I am happy to know that the Senate has the remedy in its own hands, and that, by an appeal, my error may be corrected without injury to anyone. Or if I have wholly mistaken my duty in this delicate matter, the action of the Senate will soon convince me of that fact, and in that even I shall cheerfully leave it to the disposition of the Senate. But I have an undoubting confidence that while I am right, I shall be fully sustained.

"I trust I shall be pardoned for making one or two suggestions on some points of minor importance. This body has been so long and so justly distinguished for its dignity and decorum, that I cannot but apprehend that some neglect on my part renders these remarks necessary. We all know that many little irregularities may be tolerated in a small body that would cause much disorder in a large one. The Senate has increased from 26 to 60 Members. The natural tendency of the increase of Members is to relax the discipline—that when the strict observance of rules is most essential to the dignity and comfort of the body, it is the most difficult to enforce.

"The second rule is a very salutary one, but perhaps too stringent to be always observed in practice. It reads as follows:

" 'No Member shall speak to another, or otherwise interrupt the business of the Senate, or read any newspaper while the Journals or public papers are reading, or when any Member is speaking in any debate.'

"Mr. Jefferson, in his Manual (p. 140), which seems to be a code of common law for the regulation of all parliamentary debates in the country, says that no one is to disturb another in his speech, etc., nor to pass between the Speaker and the speaking Member. These are comparatively trifling matters, and yet the rules and law of the Senate would seem to require that its Presiding Officer should see them enforced. I trust, however, that it is only necessary to call attention to them to insure their observance by every Senator. But the practice seems to have grown up of interrupting a Senator when speaking, by addressing him directly, instead of addressing the Chair, as required by the rule.

"The Manual declares that it is a breach of order for one Member to interrupt another while speaking, unless by calling him to order, if he departs from it. It seems to me that the objection should be a very urgent one, indeed, that can justify one Member in interrupting another while speaking, and that all would find it to their advantage if this rule were more strictly enforced than it has been, and that in all cases the Senator rising to explain should address the Chair, as required by the rule.

"As Presiding Officer of the Senate, I feel that my duty consists in executing its law, as declared by its rules and by its practice. If these rules are too strict, it would be better to modify than violate them. But we have a common interest and feel a common pride in the order and dignity of this body, and I therefore feel that I can appeal with confidence to every Senator to aid me in enforcing these salutary regulations. I feel it my duty to say this much before proceeding to the course of action I have decided upon.

* * * * *

"Mr. KING. I have listened with great attention to the statement of the Presiding Officer, and entirely concur in the views he expresses of the rights and duties appertaining to that position. It is necessary—it is essentially necessary, that those duties should be strictly performed by the Vice President, or any other Presiding Officer whom the Senate may select in his absence. They should feel it to be their imperative duty to enforce order, to protect persons in debate, and put down every species of disorder. I hope, therefore, that we may have this statement placed on the Journal, as a guide to other Presiding Officers, and I move that it be placed there, if it meets, as I trust it will, the full approbation of the Senate.

"The motion to enter the Vice President's statement on the Journal was agreed to unanimously."

In 1856 the question of Senate decorum again became a matter of debate. A Senate committee reported a motion to amend the rules to provide, among other things, that Senators when speaking were to confine themselves to the question under debate. The suggested amendment was not adopted by general assent, but the Senators for the most part also agreed that the suggested amendment merely recited the rule which had been controlling since the beginning of the Congress in 1789.

The pertinent parts of the 1856 debate with emphasis supplied by italics follow:

"[From the Congressional Globe, June 26, 1856, pp. 1477–1484]

"JESSE D. BRIGHT, Senator of Indiana (the President pro tempore). The Secretary read the proposed amendments to the 3d and 6th rules; which are, to amend the 3d rule by inserting, after the word 'place,' in line 2, 'and shall confine himself to the question under debate. He shall avoid personality, and shall not reflect improperly upon any State;' so that the rule will read:

" '3. Every Member, when he speaks, shall address the Chair, standing in his place, and shall confine himself to the question under debate. He shall avoid personality, and shall not reflect improperly upon any State; and when he has finished shall sit down.'

"Mr. JUDAH P. BENJAMIN, Senator of Louisiana. I have no objection to these amendments, except to the first clause, which I deem to be entirely unnecessary, and will probably give rise to more confusion and difficulty than would occur in its absence. The first clause, which requires the person speaking to confine himself to the subject under debate, will give opportunities for constant calls to order; but we all very well know that the Senate will never refuse to hear a gentleman if any line of remark that he thinks proper to make on any public subject, if he is not guilty of any indecorum or impropriety of speech. I think the provision useless—entirely so. It is a rule which will merely give opportunities for calls to order and wrangling, as to whether or not a gentleman is in order, and is confining himself to the subject under debate—one of the most difficult questions on earth to determine. I think we had better leave that out.

"Mr. CHARLES E. STUART, Senator of Michigan. I will only suggest, in reply to the honorable Senator, that I understand this to be the rule and the parliamentary law now. I understand the same thing of every amendment which is proposed by the committee to our rules. There has been a difference among gentlemen as to what is the strict law, and as to what is the duty of the Presiding Officer of the Senate in enforcing the rules. Every amendment, I believe, except that which relates to reflecting on a State, is, in my opinion, the true construction of the rules now. The committee were induced to present this report to make the matter certain. For myself, I have no solicitude about it.

"Mr. JOHN J. CRITTENDEN, Senator of Kentucky. Mr. President, I do not think the rules require any amendment whatever, and it is a dangerous experiment to attempt it. I can say, for one, without entering into the subject, that I am unwilling that the rules of this body shall be changed. They have grown up from the experience of a thousand years. If a gentleman supposes he can now, by some 20 or 30 lines, add to those rules which have grown out of the experience and wisdom of a thousand Parliaments and Senate, I think he is mistaken. I hope we shall make no innovation on them; and I concur with what the gentleman from Louisiana has suggested, that we shall have more controversies and disputes growing out of it than now exist. We have enough already. I do not want any amendments whatever to the general rules of our proceeedings.

"Mr. JOHN P. HALE, Senator of New Hampshire. I rise to express the hope that these amendments will not prevail, and that we shall not meddle with the rules. There is great danger, at a time when anything exciting occurs, of running into hasty legislation in passing rules or laws growing out of such events. If this is the parliamentary law now, it is well enough as it is, without an additional rule.

"Mr. ANDREW P. BUTLER, Senator of South Carolina. I do not rise to add anything to what has been said by the Senator from Kentucky, or by the Senator from New Hampshire, on the point before the Senate, but simply to call the attention of the Senate to what I think was a very distinct declaration of this body in Mr. Fillmore's time, while he was Vice President, that the Chair had fully the power on any occasion to call any Member to order, when, in the opinion of the Chair, he was out of order. That right being conceded to the Chair—and I am willing that some declaration of the kind shall be made now—it is not likely to lead to abuse; because, if an appeal is taken from the Chair, we shall always have the opinion of the Senate on the point raised.

"My judgment is different from yours, Mr. President, and Mr. Calhoun's. I believe that the Chair has the power. Such certainly was the opinion of the Senate when Mr. Fillmore made the communication to which I allude, in reference to his powers. Mr. King, who was then on the floor—a very experienced parliamentarian—said at once that certainly was his understanding, and he moved that the paper communicated by the Vice President be filed as the opinion of the Senate.

"Mr. JOHN M. CLAYTON, Senator from Delaware. * * * In the days when Gaillard occupied that seat, the order preserved in the Senate was vastly better than it has been since, as men were more cautious of what they said to each other in debate.

* * * * *

"It is generally understood by every Member, when he rises in debate here, that he should confine himself to the subject before the Senate. It is a matter that I think may very well be left to the sense of propriety and dignity of every gentleman here.

"Mr. STEPHEN ADAMS, Senator from Mississippi. Mr. President, the first objection made to this amendment is to the first clause, providing that a Member shall confine himself to the question under debate. No one whom I have heard speak objects to the propriety of the debater confining himself to the subject matter under consideration. All experience in legislation has shown the propriety and necessity of such a rule. I understand it to be the parliamentary law by which we are already governed, and yet it is not definite, fixed, and certain; it is not provided for by our rules or by the parliamentary law in such a manner as to give it practical effect. For this reason it is proposed to give effect to that which is recognized by every Senator, as proper in itself, by placing it in our rules.

"It is said, however, that Senators will be liable to be called to order when they are wandering from the subject, and others do not directly understand their meaning. Why, sir, the presumption is, that Senators will not intentionally violate a rule of the body. No one will say that it is wrong to require conformity to the rule, whether the departure be intentional or unintentional. Our experience proves that Senators will sit by and listen under all circumstances, and interfere with reluctance. Our experience proves, also, that the Chair with reluctance interrupts a Senator, when he is speaking, and particularly when he is in the heat of debate. He must be guilty of a palpable violation, before either the Chair or any Senator will call him to order. I think that the confusion which Senators apprehend will not result from the proposed rule, but that good will ensue from its adoption.

"Mr. LEWIS CASS, Senator from Michigan. I say, then, we ought to do something. I am not very conversant with the rules; but if I understand the changes now proposed, I think they are very reasonable and proper.

* * * * *

"Mr. ISAAC TOUCEY, Senator from Connecticut. * * * These provisions will conduce to the facility of business, and to the decorum of debate, very much indeed. The only danger, in my judgment, is that they may not be enforced. If every Member who rose in his place to speak to any subject confined himself to that subject—if he abstained from personalities and reflections on any State * * *

* * * * *

"Mr. JOHN P. HALE, Senator of New Hampshire. * * * If it be, I should not like to see the liberty of debate infringed upon here. And when I speak of the liberty of debate, I do not mean the license of debate, for I will go as far as anybody to restrict and restrain that. But, sir, I would say of this liberty of debate, this freedom of speech (distinguishing it always from license), as was said in olden times, and as every man can say, with a great price it has been obtained; with a very great price it has come down to us through the struggles of our ancestors in thousands of years; it has been baptized in the blood of martyrs on the scaffold, and comes to us canonized by the blessings of the good and the true, who have manifested their fidelity to the great principles of civil liberty in the history of our country ages and ages back.

"Now, sir, while I will be second to no man in restraining license and doing what may be done to keep debate within its legitimate, its constitutional limits of propriety, I am unwilling to do anything which shall have a tendency to deprive the representatives of the people or of the States * * *.

"Mr. JUDAH P. BENJAMIN, Senator from Louisiana. * * * We have had no trouble here during the time I have been a Member of this body—I do not remember a single instance where the Senate has had the slightest difficulty in conducting its deliberations—from the fact that any gentleman was going out of the subject under discussion * * *.

* * * * *

"Mr. JAMES P. BENJAMIN, Senator from Louisiana. * * * The Senator, at the same time that he says this, declares his willingness to lay down, as broadly and clearly as any man can desire, the proposition, that freedom of debate is not to degenerate into license or licentiousness of debate, and that under freedom of debate he does not claim license. Well, sir, that distinction is as old as freedom or debate itself is.

* * * * *

"Mr. CHARLES E. STUART, Senator from Michigan. Mr. President, I have listened for some time with, I confess, no little surprise, to the various discussions on the meaning of these amendments, and the meaning of the rules. Now, so far as I know, there is no single item in the amendments proposed that changes the parliamentary law which governs all deliberate assembles. That is my understanding of it. I repeat, there is not a rule of the Senate which regards debates, there is not anything in the amendments proposed, that affects this body differently from what it would be if it sat without a rule, under the parliamentary law.

* * * * *

"I am willing that they shall strike out the portion in reference to confining a Member to the subject under debate. It will not change the law in my opinion; but it will still remain in the privilege and power of the Presiding Officer to call a Senator to order whenever he thinks he is wandering from the question under debate, without these words as well as with them.

* * * * *

"Mr. JOHN J. CRITTENDEN, Senator from Kentucky. * * * I simply rise to ask him if he is of that opinion, and will withdraw all the rest he has proposed, which, he says, is but a repetition of rules already existing. If he will do this, we can have the question disposed of at once. I hope he will do it.

* * * * *

"Mr. JAMES A. PEARCE, Senator from Maryland. The rules of the Senate are not what are ordinarily so called. The few printed rules which we have were adopted for the purpose of varying, in some instances, the parliamentary law, and adding to that law in other particulars. The law which governs the proceedings of the Senate is generally the parliamentary law as laid down in the manual of Mr. Jefferson. The rules of the Senate, ordinarily so called, are altogether inadequate to the exigencies which arise in the transaction of the business of the Senate.

* * * * *

"This is an indecency for which he may and should be called to order. No Member shall digress from the subject matter to utter personality. If he does, says the parliamentary law, 'Mr. Speaker shall repress him,' that is the language.

* * * * *

"Mr. WILLIAM BIGLER, Senator from Pennsylvania. * * * I think it would be clearly right to infer that the parliamentary law, as defined by Mr. Jefferson, is the rule governing the Presiding Officer. He has a large discretion here in calling a Member to order. In arriving at a conclusion as to the performance of that duty, I take it for granted that it is intended that the parliamentary law, as defined by Mr. Jefferson, shall be his rule of action.

"Mr. JAMES C. JONES, Senator from Tennessee. I do not know that any such provision is necessary. I understood the Senator from Maryland to assume, and I have heard no dissent from his position, that the parliamentary law, as defined by Mr. Jefferson, is the rule of the Senate, with such additions as the Senate has chosen, or may choose, to make for itself. I take it for granted that that parliamentary law is the rule of the Senate. It seemed to be the general impression of this body, as far as I could see, or hear, or ascertain, that they only desired the single question settled, that the Presiding Officer had the power and the right and the duty of calling a Member to order. * * * I take it for granted that the parliamentary law, as laid down by Mr. Jefferson in his manual, is the law of the Senate, unless where it conflicts with some special rule of this body. If it were necessary, I should be willing to so define it, but I do not think it necessary. I desire to arrive at a practical result, to give the power to the Presiding Officer, to whom, in my opinion, it belongs; but it would be as well to say so expressly, and thus to relieve him from all embarrassment."

The discussion of the rules in 1856 appears to have been the last one in which Senators were generally agreed that Jefferson's Manual was, in effect, a part of the rules and that Senators were required to be relevant in their remarks. Thereafter the picture began to change. In 1863 and again in 1865 the Senate was the scene of brief but intense filibusters staged a day or two just prior to final adjournment of the short session which ended on the 4th of March of each of those years.

The filibuster in 1863 was stopped by an arbitrary ruling of the Chair. The filibuster in 1865 was successful in defeating legislation to grant the State of Louisiana again the full rights of a State. This filibuster is listed by Dr. George Galloway in his study of filibusters as the first one successfully to block legislation. By 1872 the Senate no longer required a Senator to be relevant in his remarks. In that year Vice President Schuyler Colfax ruled that "under the practice of the Senate the Presiding Officer could not restrain a Senator in remarks which the Senator considers pertinent to the pending issue."

With this ruling the Senate had abandoned effective control over debate. The day of the filibuster had arrived. In 1879 the Republicans, by successful filibuster, defeated legislation to repeal Federal election laws. In December 1890 and January 1891 in the 2d session of the 51st Congress, the Democrats staged a successful filibuster against passage of the so-called force bills. Thereafter almost every session of Congress witnessed one or more successful stultifying filibusters.

The chapter headings of Dr. Burdette's book "Filibustering" in the Senate significantly read as follows:

"An Instrument of Policy?" (This covers roughly the period from John Randolph's days in the Senate (1826) down through 1879); "Filibustering Unrestrained" (1880 through 1907); "The Modern Filibuster" (1908–17); and "Turmoil" (1917–40, date of publication of book).

In spite of the Senate's abandonment of Jefferson's Manual as controlling over debate, down through the years a Senator could be heard from time to time appealing to the Senate to return to the original practices. For instance, as recently as 1925 Senator Joseph T. Robinson, a distinguished and able Democratic senatorial floor leader, contended:

"No change in the written rules of the Senate is necessary to prevent irrelevant debate. Parliamentary procedure everywhere contemplates that a speaker shall limit his remarks to the subject under consideration. The difficulty grows out of the failure of the Presiding Officer of the Senate to enforce this rule."

Even today, however, the Senate does not have free or unlimited debate in certain aspects of its work. In its rule that an amendment may be tabled without prejudicing the principal measure under debate the Senate adopted a forceful check on debate—and one that was resisted for years.

For years one of the favorite but permissible and legitimate dilatory devices had been to offer amendments and then to talk about them at length.

Another instance is found in the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1949. It provides that debate on Presidential reorganization plans shall be limited to 5 hours on each side. Further evidence that it is not considered unreasonable to suggest that the Senate severely limit debate and prevent other dilatory tactics was recently provided in the reciprocal trade agreements bill as reported by the Senate Committee on Finance. While the bill did not pass the Senate as reported, the reported bill contained severe limitations on debate admittedly designed to prevent a filibuster against Senate action to support any Presidential decision to overrule the recommendations of the Tariff Commission. In reporting the bill with these provisions the committee said the provisions were intended to prevent a successful filibuster. Some Senators who have opposed any change in rule XXII voted for the committee's severe cloture language. Indeed, it seems that we do not hesitate to restrict ourselves except perhaps in one field—that of civil rights. If that issue be raised, then it is that we hear about the historic tradition of "free debate." But we have seen that this is a myth. It is time that the opponents of civil rights cease taking refuge in that argument and debate the issue on its merits.

The filibuster as seen from the Senate floor

Many of the Senate's outstanding Members have condemned the filibuster in the strongest terms. Some sample comments follow:

Senator Robert L. Owen, of Oklahoma:

"No one man, no matter how sincere he may be or how patriotic his purpose, should be permitted to take the floor of the Senate and keep the floor against the will of every man in the Senate except himself, and coerce, and intimidate the Senate. To do so is to destroy the most important principle of self-government—the right of majority rule. * * * My use of this bad practice to serve the people does not in any wise change my opinion about the badness of the practice of permitting a filibuster. I acted within the practice, but I think the practice is indefensible, and I illustrated its vicious character by coercing the Senate and compelling it to yield to my individual will."

Senator Thomas J. Walsh, of Montana:

"A majority may adopt the rules, in the first place. It is preposterous to assert that they may deny to future majorities the right to change them. A court would make itself the subject of ridicule that should attempt to adopt rules one of which should provide that they could be changed only by a vote of two-thirds of the judges. It would not be tyrannical to make such a rule; it would be futile. The court, when wiser men graced the bench, would contemptuously, by a majority, set it aside. It is scarcely less preposterous that a legislative body should by rule deny itself the right to bring debate to an end and to proceed to a vote; nay, that it should by rule provide that so long as any Member should hold the floor and pretend to debate, there should be no vote; that though such pretense should be persisted in until it became a hollow mockery, a transparent sham, a subject of open raillery and jocularity, there should be no vote; that so long as there remains one Member with physical strength to keep the floor there should be no vote."

Senator Oscar W. Underwood of Alabama (speaking in support of his motion for majority cloture by use of the motion for the previous question in 1925):

"Every Senator who knows me knows that I have been opposed to unlimited debate in the Senate ever since I have been a Member of the Senate; that I believe in a reasonable cloture rule. But if the Senate is going to play the game of allowing deuces to run wild, to have unlimited debate, and anybody can engage in a direct or concealed filibuster if he desires to do so, I want to assure my friends that when I thought the occasion was of sufficient importance I would not hesitate for a moment, now or any other time, to use the rules of the body by which we play the game to effect the legislation that I desired. I do not blame any Senator for using those rules as long as they are the rules. I am not critical of the Senator who plays the game according to the rules; and that is the rule."

Senator John Sherman, of Ohio:

"The rules of the Senate are made to expedite the public business in an orderly and proper manner. We are not here for any other purpose except to legislate, to make laws. * * * All the rules ought to aim for the accomplishment of that purpose and no other. * * * The right to debate a question broadly has been recognized by the Senate of the United States from the beginning of our Government; but when the rules of this body, intended to expedite legislation, are used as an obstruction by the minority in order to defeat the will of the majority in rules should as soon as possible be corrected, changed, and altered."

Senator James Hamilton Lewis, of Illinois:

"[The filibuster] is bringing upon this body the contempt of the Nation and the disrespect of mankind."

Senator Joseph T. Robinson, of Arkansas:

"The question involved, is whether at a time when the country is suffering from a depression unparalleled in its history, at a time when legislation is badly needed, the Senate will demonstrate its unfitness and its incapacity to do business. Why not debate these issues, determine them upon their merits, and let a majority of the Senate decide?"

Vice President Charles G. Dawes (describing the end of a session):

"The most determined obstructionists are fawned upon, cajoled, flattered—anything to get their acquiescence that the Senate may do its constitutional duty—but so far in vain. It is a shameful spectacle—and yet so common that it passes here as a matter of course."

On an earlier occasion Mr. Dawes stated:

"It is amusing to note the attitude toward cloture. So jealous are the Senators of the prerogatives given individuals through the power of obstruction made possible by the absence of the majority cloture rule obtaining in all other important parliamentary bodies that they are reluctant to make use of even this kind of cloture. The idea of giving precedence to the right of the majority to perform their duties over the 'sacred right of free speech' seems more or less obnoxious. This 'sacred right of free speech' in the Senate often translates itself in practice into the right of any individual to indulge for as long a time as he desires in oratory, relevant or irrelevant to the subject under consideration. This, of course, is no true definition of the right of free speech. When the Senators vote by two-thirds to limit debate under the present cloture rule they do subjugate this ridiculous privilege to the higher duty they owe the Government under the Constitution.

"The invoking of the present two-thirds cloture rule practically negatives the arguments against majority cloture, and this may account for the reluctance to use it. Such public demonstrations of the viciousness of the present rules are not welcomed, but they have to be made. There have been many able Senators, like Oscar W. Underwood, Charles S. Thomas, Atlee Pomerene and others who, in the past, have urged the reformation of the Senate rules and pointed out the outrages upon the public interest which they, in their present form, have made possible.

"No one in the Senate, however, has yet undertaken to reform the rules by the threat to use them against the proper conduct of business until they are reformed—in other words, to use them as a bludgeon to force a reform instead of to force through some personal or sectional legislation, generally to the public disadvantage."

Summary

We have seen how the early Senate by use of the motion for the previous question and the precedents in "Jefferson's Manual" and by the Vice President's unappealable authority to rule on questions of order and decorum held filibusters in effective check. We have noted the gradual erosion of that control over debate after the Civil War until finally it was lost.

Article I, section 5, clause 2 of the Constitution of the United States provides that each House may determine the rules of its proceedings. A majority of the Senate in the first instance adopted the Senate rules, and a majority of the Senate may amend the Senate rules. In view of this, is it not strangely undemocratic to require 64 Senators to vote affirmatively in order to close a debate on any measure and bring it to a vote? Is it not even more strange to have a provision (sec. 3, of rule XXII) under which the Senate may not vote on a motion to change the rules as long as even one Senator wishes to prevent the vote by speaking? Of course, one Senator acting by himself cannot for long prevent a vote on changing the rules, but a few Senators (far less than a majority) can do so.

The problem of controlling filibusters is of the first magnitude because the mere threat of a filibuster affects, to more or less extent, all important and controversial legislation. In recent years successful filibusters have involved solely the legislative struggles to assure Negroes equality under the law in fact as well as in theory.

This is the emotionally charged background behind the entire controversy over cloture and the question of the Senate's adoption of "rules" (either new or old) at the beginning of each new Congress.

The country needs to find solutions to the problems involving civil rights. These problems cannot find adequate solutions as long as a minority of Senators can, by filibuster or the threat of filibuster, block legislation designed to assist Negroes in their efforts to achieve first-class citizenship. Moreover, this basic problem influences many other aspects of American life, such as education and housing. Until the Senate reforms rule XXII, we shall face almost insurmountable obstacles in our efforts to make progress in these fields.

In order for the Senate to become a more effective and democratic body, responsive to the desires and needs of the majority of American citizens, it must reform its rules and return to practices of the early days. Senate Resolution 17 is a very moderate step in this direction.

CLIFFORD P. CASE.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I should like to ask unanimous consent, in connection with the unanimous consent just granted, that there may be printed in the RECORD extracts from the individual views of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] on amending rule XXII relating to cloture. It is Report No. 87 of the 80th Congress, 1st session.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should like to have that printed also, but I would suggest that it be printed at the conclusion of my remarks, rather than in the text of my address.

Mr. HOLLAND. That would be acceptable to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. HOLLAND. I wonder whether the Senator would yield one more time?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Then I shall go to dinner, as the Senator from Pennsylvania has suggested.

First I should like to say that the Senator from Florida is not unmindful of the fact that his distinguished friends are trying to prove that he and his colleagues are not good Confederates.

Mr. DOUGLAS. We are far more moderate than the southerners.

Mr. HOLLAND. That might not be hard to prove, but we would never confess it.

Secondly, I should like to say that while we appreciate the fact that the Senate of the Confederacy has been mentioned in the same breath with the Senate of the United States, we are a little bit reluctant to admit that the legislatures of the several States should be mentioned in the same breath, because it is well known that the sessions of most of the legislatures are limited in time—in Florida 60 days, including Sundays—and likewise that the members of the senate and the house of the various State legislatures are, as a rule, good citizens who are elected because they are willing to make sacrifices, and in most cases are not even paid expenses. Members of the Florida Legislature received $7 a day when I served in the Florida Senate.

Therefore the reasoning which would apply to the Senate of the United States, whose Members are selected and paid well for devoting their whole time to the duties of their office, is entirely different.

With that statement I shall go on my way, except to add that it seems to me the overwhelming defeat administered to the Anderson amendment this morning indicated that Mr. White evidently knew what he was talking about when he said that the leadership which is trying to force drastic amendments onto the cloture rule are attempting to use extreme and impracticable measures.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should like to make it clear that I cast no reflection on the legislatures of Southern States or on the Confederate Senate. On the contrary, I cite their rules as authority for the reasonableness of our much more reasonable provisions. We are really reasonable, compared with the rules of the Southern States. We are really reasonable. Perhaps one difference may be that the dominant groups in the South do not accord to any minorities which may be present there the veto power which they claim for themselves here. They do not accord to others the privileges which they have obtained here and which they are fighting to hold.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wish to make one more supplementary comment. I did not introduce the names of the Senators from Wyoming, Arizona, and Idaho into this discussion. That was done by the Senator from Florida. I want to make that perfectly clear. I do not question their sincerity or their right to hold any view they desire.

I have never criticized any Member of the Senate for any vote which he has cast. I make that as a rule. I do not pretend to know it all. I do not pretend to be infallible. I merely claim the right to present my views and to let the Senate and the public judge as to their reasonableness.

Now I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Georgia for a question; or if he wishes to make a speech, I shall yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. TALMADGE. I thank the Senator from Illinois. Before I make my speech, I desire to make a comment.

The Senator from Illinois has seen fit to try to compare the cloture rule in the respective legislatures of the various States with that of the U.S. Senate. I point out to the distinguished Senator from Illinois that, as he well knows, the U.S. Senate is a council of 49 sovereign States, whereas the general assembly of a respective State represents only the State itself involved, and is not a council of the respective States.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I tried to deal with this subject yesterday, when the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] said that Senators were ambassadors from their sovereign States. That is a clear indication to me of a belief by the Senators from Georgia that this country is not a nation but is instead a confederation, and that the ultimate power rests in the States.

This issue was fought out for many decades prior to 1861. It was the constitutional issue upon which the Civil War was waged. We all regret that war. We are proud of the heroism which was displayed in it. My ancestors fought on the northern side, as I am sure the ancestors of the Senator from Georgia fought on the southern side. There were brave men on both sides, and we honor their memory.

But as a result of that war I thought it had been established that the United States is a nation, and that the Senate of the United States is not merely a council to which the sovereign States send their members, with the right of secession and with other rights of veto. I had thought that we were now a nation operating under the Constitution; operating under the amendments to the Constitution, including the 14th and 15th amendments to the Constitution. If others hold a different opinion, I can only say that if their point of view is pressed to its ultimate conclusion, this country will have unhappy experiences, which certainly I do not wish to see, and which I do not believe the men who are advancing this outmoded constitutional theory really wish in their hearts to see happen.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield on that point?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE] and I had this out at great length in our report.

I think it is a fact that Senators who take the view held by the Senator from Georgia do not give, in our opinion, adequate weight to the fact that the Founding Fathers provided for two Senators from every State, no matter how small the State, exactly to compensate for that proposal; whereas the filibuster proposal is an extra constitutional safeguard imported only by the rules of the Senate.

The fundamental point of our argument is that if it is not in the Constitution, then we ought to excise it, or have the right to excise it, by the same power which put it in.

I thank the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield further?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Illinois may yield to me, so that I may make some remarks, the remarks to appear at the conclusion of his address, and that the Senator from Illinois not lose his right to the floor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am very glad to yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(At this point Mr. DOUGLAS yielded to Mr. TALMADGE, who addressed the Senate and whose remarks appear in the RECORD at the conclusion of Mr. DOUGLAS' speech.)

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield for a question or a speech.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Florida engaged a few minutes ago in a colloquy in which the Senator from Florida suggested that we who favor a substantial change in the filibuster rule should indicate our appreciation of the generosity of our friends from the South for their failure to invoke a filibuster. I, for myself, am happy to comment on that generosity and to comment on it favorably. I must say, however, that I think that that generosity was induced, at least in part, by enlightened self-interest, and that there was a feeling on the part of those wise statesmen from the States below the Mason-Dixon line, that to threaten a filibuster at this point in the Nation's development would not be in the best interests of their own position.

Furthermore, I should like to make the point that many of us, I think, would much prefer to rely not on the generosity of our friends from the South, which is exceeded by no one, so far as I am concerned, but upon the rules of the Senate and our democratic rights as Members of this body.

So it seems to me that the comment about the generosity of our friends in not indulging in a filibuster is not a particularly relevant comment on the debate which is now taking place. I wonder if my friend from Illinois agrees with that point of view.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I quite agree.

Mr. CLARK. I wonder if my friend from Illinois will also agree with me that for obvious reasons some of our friends who are opposed to us in this regard are tending to make great weight out of the ability of the majority leader to adjourn the Senate with only 23 dissenting votes and the ability of the majority and minority leaders to hold us down to 36 votes on the Anderson motion.

I wonder, further, if the Senator from Illinois will agree with me that those 36 votes might well have been 56 votes if the Johnson resolution were not the next pending business on the floor, and if we did not have an opportunity to amend that resolution so as to make it conform more closely to what the Senator from Illinois and most of the rest of us would like to see done.

Mr. DOUGLAS. One of the chief arguments used in support of the Johnson motion to table was that we could change the present rule XXII by the proposed Johnson Senate Resolution 30 of the 85th Congress, or as it is at present, Senate Resolution 5. It was said that by tabling we were not giving away the chance to make substantive changes of a meaningful nature in rule XXII and that we could amend the Johnson resolution as we saw fit. I think the term he used was that we could "work our will."

A good many Senators, I think, voted with that in mind. To say now that because they voted for the motion to table, this is a defeat also for amendments to the Johnson motion, indicates that it was a flimflam practice, as I thought it was, which was being practiced at the time.

Mr. CLARK. I regret that almost of necessity at this time of the evening not only is the floor practically vacant, but the press gallery appears to be almost entirely vacant. I think the headlines which have been printed as a result of the votes taken Wednesday and today in this regard are to some extent deceptive to the country, because they indicate a smashing defeat for the liberal coalition. They take the position which is taken by the distinguished senior Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND], who has left the Chamber. To my way of thinking, although we got only 23 votes to oppose a motion to adjourn, and 36 votes to sustain the Anderson motion, perhaps I am unduly optimistic, but I expect the next time we will get still more votes; and I believe that before the day is done and the battle is ended we shall have achieved a result, in connection with rule XXII, far more effective than the innocuous amendment which some of our colleagues have proposed. I wonder whether the Senator from Illinois shares my optimistic view.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I share that hope.

I remember the old Scottish song, which my ancestors used to sing, "I lay me doon and bleed a while, then rise and fight again."

We have done some bleeding today; but we will rise and fight again on Monday.

Mr. CLARK. Or the proverb that "He who fights and runs away will live to fight another day."

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wish to make clear that I have not run away. I never run away. I shall not become discouraged by any votes; neither will I be intimidated by any newspaper columnists or by any threats of any kind whatsoever.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Illinois, the Senator from Pennsylvania, and others of our colleagues, among whom is the distinguished majority leader, who has just now returned to the floor, certainly do not run away. But I suspect that some of our colleagues—both those who were in favor of the motion to adjourn and those who are opposed to the Anderson motion—are waiting and are postponing the submission of their more stringent measures until they see the whites of the eyes of their opponents—probably on Monday.

Mr. DOUGLAS. No doubt.

Mr. CLARK. However, during my few years of service in the Senate and during my colleague's large number of years in the Senate—I believe he has served in the Senate for 12 years——

Mr. DOUGLAS. This is my 11th year of service here.

Mr. CLARK. At any rate, I may say that during my service in the Senate, time after time I have seen the sentiment of this body lag days, months, and years behind the sentiment of the country.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think it is already lagging behind the sentiment of the country; and I think it is now about time that the sentiment of the Senate caught up with the opinion of the country.

Mr. CLARK. Yes. As was pointed out the other day, certainly it is time to reduce that lag and to minimize it; and I think my colleagues and I are doing what we can to minimize it, when we propose this moderate change, in order to make majority rule prevail after debate which could easily last 4, 6, or 8 weeks.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I quite agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. I believe that one purpose of the debate tonight is to try to change that attitude in the Senate.

I hope many of our colleagues will read what is being said here, and I hope that perhaps the press will take note of it. Certainly, one of our duties is to see to it that in the days ahead we do not become mesmerized by delusions of omnipotence and thoughts that we know best, and do not continue to use measures which have lost their usefulness, but, instead, do our utmost to render all the service we possibly can perform.

So I wish to commend the Senator from Illinois for his suport of a measure which at least to some extent will bring the thinking in the Senate more up to date or more nearly on a par with the thinking of the country at large.

If my friend will indulge me further, I should like to ask him to give careful consideration to the resolution which has been submitted by the majority leader, on behalf of himself, the President pro tempore, the minority leader, and other Senators. It is the resolution we are now seeking to amend. In the course of the enlightening presentation the Senator from Illinois already has made, he has pointed out that the first section of the resolution, which would make the change from "two-thirds of the Senators elected and qualified" to "two-thirds of the Senators present and voting," contains a minor but a relatively unimportant improvement of the filibuster rule—an improvement which the distinguished Senator from Georgia, who was opposed to the change, thinks is quite immaterial. Am I correct in that regard?

Mr. DOUGLAS. It can be seen with a microscope, but a very powerful microscope is required in order to detect it.

Mr. CLARK. We also agreed, did we not, that section 2 of the resolution makes some minor improvement in the present rule? Is that correct?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Again I say that the improvement can possibly be detected by using a powerful magnifying glass, but is hardly visible to the naked eye.

Mr. CLARK. It is true, is it not, that in 1949, one reason why the present unsatisfactory rule was adopted was that it was then impossible to bring to a vote a satisfactory change in the rule, because there was then a provision which prohibited the invoking of cloture on the debate on a motion to change a Senate rule? Is that correct?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The proponents of the rule change in 1949 claimed that it closed a loophole.

Mr. CLARK. Now let us consider the third section of Senate Resolution 5. I should like to ask my friend to comment rather specifically on the provision of Senate Resolution 5 that—

2. The rules of the Senate shall continue from one Congress to the next Congress unless they are changed as provided in these rules.

If that provision is adopted, in January 1961, shall not we be faced with the same old proposition of a filibuster against any rule change which confronts us now, and which has been withheld at this time only because the enlightened self-interest of our southern friends has indicated that that was a wise thing to do? Is not this part of the resolution one which perhaps makes it so completely unacceptable to those of us who would like to eliminate the lag in the sentiment of the Senate?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think section 1 of the Johnson resolution is no improvement, and section 3 of that resolution has no virtue. It requires a two-thirds vote to change the rules. That will be just as ineffective a preventive or cure of a filibuster as the present requirement. At some time I should like to discuss the substantive features of why the two-thirds requirement is almost impossible to fulfill in the case of civil-rights measures.

Mr. CLARK. With respect to the third section of Senate Resolution 5, is it not correct to say that it takes a position diametrically opposite to the advisory opinion given us by the Vice President?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Oh, yes.

Mr. CLARK. And it would be a repudiation of the opinion given us by the Vice President, if we were to attempt to proceed along that line?

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is true. I hope our Republican friends across the aisle will not desert the Vice President in connection with this matter; and if they cannot support the principle on its own account, I hope that on this point, at least, they will have loyalty to the Vice President. I hasten to say that some of the Members across the aisle are beyond reproach in their attitude on this subject. I am merely referring to the party wheelhorses who go along. I say that if they vote for section 3, that action will be a repudiation of the very able Vice President of the United States, who in all probability will be the standard bearer of their party in 1960.

Mr. CLARK. I wish to ask a final question; and then I shall thank my friend for his indulgence, and shall desist.

I believe it would be very helpful if the Senator from Illinois would make a brief exposition in regard to how really moderate his amendment is, in view of the amount of extended debate which could take place in the Senate if the rule we sponsor were adopted, because I think there is a great misconception, throughout the country and among our colleagues, and certainly among the so-called pundits, as to how rigorous this limitation of debate by majority rule would be.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I had intended to do so somewhat later in my address, but I shall be very glad to do it now.

PENDING AMENDMENT PROVIDES FOR A REASONABLE AND MODERATE LIMITATION OF DEBATE

The proposal of our bipartisan group for a new, effective, antifilibuster rule, which was approved by a majority of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration in 1958, provides for debate limitation in two ways.

First, it retains the provision of the Johnson resolution—in section 1 of Senate Resolution 5—dealing with cloture by two-thirds vote; namely, it provides for cloture by a vote of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting 2 days after the filing of a petition for limitation by 16 Senators. The Johnson resolution would resurrect the rule which was in effect prior to 1949.

Secondly, it provides for cloture by a vote of the majority of the Senators elected 15 days after a petition is filed by 16 Senators.

Mr. CLARK. How much debate could take place during those 15 days?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Fifteen days of debate; and, I may say, Sundays and holidays are not included. So there would be a minimum of 2½ weeks of debate after the filing of the motion.

Mr. CLARK. In that time would my friend agree that any Senator who had any opinions to express on the subject would have ample opportunity to be heard?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; but this is only a small part of the debate which we would permit.

In either case, if the required affirmative votes are cast for limitation, the proposal provides that each Senator would thereafter be entitled to an additional hour of debate, or, potentially, 98 hours, before the bill or motion would be voted upon.

CLOTURE BY A MAJORITY OF ALL SENATORS, OR BY 50 VOTES, WOULD STILL PERMIT EXTENDED DEBATE UNDER PROPOSED AMENDMENT

In order that the full meaning of the proposal for majority limitation—the second of the proposals—may be clear, the following are the steps which would be involved, and this is very important, and the readers of the RECORD should note them with care:

First, since the petition for limitation requires the signatures of 16 Senators, in the absence of an emergency threatening national security, it is clear that no petition would be filed before there was some real evidence of a filibuster.

Mr. CLARK. I think that is important, and I thank the Senator for calling it to my attention.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Thus, from 2 to 3 weeks of debate would occur before such a substantial number of Senators would set a debate limitation procedure in motion.

Second, after the petition was filed, there would be 15 additional days of debate, excluding Sundays and holidays, before the vote on limiting debate could be taken.

Mr. CLARK. That is 1 month.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is an additional 2½ weeks, but it would be a total of at least 4 or 5 weeks up to the time the petition was voted upon.

Mr. CLARK. It would be more than that, because then each Senator would have an hour in which to speak.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct.

Third, if 50 votes were then cast for limitation of debate, each Senator would be allowed another hour in which to speak. If only 36 took advantage of this opportunity, it would add almost another week of normal Senate sessions. This adds up to a minimum of 5 or 6 weeks in all before a final vote on passage of a bill or action on a motion.

Now we come to the clincher:

Fourth, if extended debate were engaged in on the preliminary motion to bring up a bill—as former Senator Lehman pointed out in his letter to the Evening Star—then the 5 or 6 weeks of debate before a final vote on that motion could be secured could be followed by extending debate on the bill itself, necessitating a further or second limitation of debate, or cloture, to reach a vote on final passage of the bill itself.

Mr. CLARK. What was the word that the great William White applied to the proposal?

Mr. DOUGLAS. That it was "indefensible extremism."

Mr. CLARK. That is very interesting.

Mr. DOUGLAS. This procedure would add at least another 3 weeks, omitting the waiting period previously described. There would finally have been from 8 to 9 weeks of debate, at a minimum, before, by action of a majority of those elected, the Senate eventually reached a vote on the bill.

In this connection, I should like to point out that in the case of civil rights measures there has been extended debate on motions to consider such a bill. For example, in 1957 there were 8 days of debate on the motion merely to bring up a civil rights bill.

DEBATE OF 2 TO 3 MONTHS IS NOT GAG RULE

The pending proposal obviously permits full, fair, and even prolonged debate; but it also leaves it ultimately within the power of a majority of the whole Senate to reach the crux of the matter, namely, a vote on passage of the measure thus lengthily considered.

There is no basis whatsoever for the charge that this proposal would impose gag rule upon the Senate. On the contrary, there could be full and prolonged debate, going on for week after week, for even possibly 2 or 3 months, but ultimately a majority would have the power to bring a measure to a vote.

Mr. CLARK. I thank my friend for his excellent address and his comments, and for his courtesy in permitting me to engage in this colloquy.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator. He has been a tower of strength, not only for his courage, which is great, but for his legal ability, which is acute. I always thought the phrase "Philadelphia lawyer" was inappropriate, but after seeing the Senator from Pennsylvania in action, I am inclined to think that the reputation of the Philadelphia bar was well deserved, and that the modern generation has even surpassed those who from the period of the Civil War to 1880 put Philadelphia at the head of the Nation, both in the legal and in the medical fields.

Mr. CLARK. In the unhappy event that I should not come back to this body in 1962, I would like to use the encomium of the Senator from Illinois on my shingle where I would practice law.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would indeed be ready to engage the Senator as my lawyer, but his talents are so great I am afraid I would not be able to pay his fee, unless he did the job as a charity case.

Mr. CLARK. I thank my friend.

Mr. DOUGLAS. In answer to the point of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] that a ruthless majority could adjourn every day and thus prevent debate on any of the 15 days following the filing of a cloture petition, I may say that if he will offer and support an amendment requiring the Senate to meet on the 15 days for at least 10 hours a day, except on adjournment by unanimous consent, I shall accept such an amendment.

BEHIND PROCEDURAL DEBATE LIE SUBSTANTIVE MEASURES OF GREAT NATIONAL IMPORTANCE

Mr. President, we have conducted the debate thus far on the question of procedure, the procedure of discussing measures. These problems of procedure were the ways the constitutional debates prior to the Civil War were handled, but everyone knew what was behind the constitutional debates of that period. The burning issue out of which those constitutional debates grew was the fact of slavery, which was the predominant social and labor institution of the Southern States, whereas in the North, not necessarily by superior virtue, but by climate and history, slavery did not exist, and the proportion of the Negro population to the total population was relatively slight.

That was the issue. I shall not go into such complexities as the efforts of the South to expand the institution of slavery, or the view of my namesake, Stephen A. Douglas, whose chair I now occupy, that the issue should be left to the people of the various Territories. Nor shall I go into the theory of Lincoln, that the power of the National Government should be used to prevent the spread of slavery into the Territories.

Out of that conflict of expansion on the one hand and resistance on the other a terrible Civil War was fought. As I said yesterday, I do not wish to wave the bloody shirt or dwell upon the details of that terrible conflict. There were heroes on both sides. But out of the conflict came the conclusion, as I have said before, that the United States is a nation. The constitutional theories of the South were rejected. The 13th amendment, which freed the slaves, was ratified.

The 14th amendment, which provides that all persons born in the United States or naturalized therein are citizens of the United States as well as citizens of the respective States, was adopted. There was to be no differentiation between citizens. There were to be no first-class citizens or second-class citizens, but all were to be citizens of equal stature and equal importance. The amendment also provided that no State should deprive any citizen of equal protection of the laws. Then there was a final section which stated that the Federal Government could enforce the amendment by appropriate legislation.

The 14th amendment was followed by the 15th amendment.

Mr. STENNIS. It was provided that Congress could enforce it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Mississippi invites my attention to the fact that Congress could enforce the amendment by appropriation legislation. The Senator is correct.

The 15th amendment provided that no citizen of the United States should be deprived of the right to vote because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Again it was stated that Congress could enforce the amendment by appropriate legislation.

These were two great amendments. I will say that I have studied the circumstances under which each was debated and adopted. After the Civil War legislation was enacted to give effect to them, but through repeal, disuse, and a very unfortunate decision of the Supreme Court in 1896, they became virtually inoperative.

In recent years, starting first with the courts, a series of decisions were handed down to protect the right to vote and to define more clearly the rights of citizens under the 14th amendment, such as the right of citizens to travel by means of public conveyance without segregation on the basis of race.

Then came the historic decision of the Supreme Court in the Brown case in 1954, with the declaration that the segregation of schoolchildren on the basis of race or color served to deprive citizens of the equal protection of the laws and therefore was in violation of the 14th amendment.

That was a unanimous opinion, concurred in by all nine Justices of the United States Supreme Court. It was handed down by the man who I believe to be the number one American at the present time, the great Chief Justice of the United States, Earl Warren, but it was concurred in by three Justices who came from the South: Mr. Justice Black, Mr. Justice Clark, and Mr. Justice Reed. It was concurred in by those who had previously been Democrats and those who had previously been Republicans. It was not a capricious decision of the Court. The case was argued twice. The facts were fully developed. Even then, the Court held conferences with the attorneys general of the various States to try to work out a method of operation under it.

Then in 1955 the Court rendered a supplementary opinion. It was ruled that the localities should move forward with all "deliberate speed." The Court did not prescribe a uniform method of desegregation or uniform timing, but did say that the method and the timing should not be used indefinitely to postpone compliance.

We have had a tangled history in this Nation during the last 4 years. I think the Federal courts have played their part in a magnificent fashion. I have no criticism of the judiciary of the United States. I have taken the floor of this body on numerous occasions and I shall, if necessary, take it again, to defend these opinions of the Supreme Court.

EXECUTIVE AND LEGISLATIVE ACTION NEEDED TO BRING COMPLIANCE WITH 14TH AMENDMENT

I am sorry to say I do not think the executive branch of the Government has shown much determination or much willingness to enforce this decision, and the legislative branch has taken no steps at all to protect the rights of individuals under the 14th amendment.

Our minds go back to the debate on what started out to be the civil rights bill of 1957 and what wound up to be a voting rights bill. It had both titles III and IV. Title III, I think, was very badly drafted. It did not state its real purpose. It was subject to attack on the ground that it was casuistical. I think the drafters of that title—probably in the Attorney General's office—did not fully inform Congress as to what they intended to do. However, on close analysis—and in this respect I think the Senator from Georgia deserves great credit—it became apparent that title III was designed to throw protection around the 14th amendment to the Constitution as interpreted by the Supreme Court. Despite the defects of draftsmanship and despite the—I will not say "duplicity" but I will say "casuistry" with which the language was drafted, the issue was presented, and I thought the general purposes were good and desirable. In company with a large number of my fellows, I supported the bill and title or part III.

We know what happened. Senators were told—and I think possibly the majority leader had a share in this—that if title III remained in the bill our southern friends would indulge in a filibuster against the whole bill and we would get nothing, not even title IV.

THREAT OF FILIBUSTER ALSO WEAKENS SUBSTANTIVE LEGISLATION

I desire now to emphasize a point which is extremely important. One cannot measure the evil effects of a filibuster merely on those occasions when the filibuster actually takes place. As the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE] have remarked, the threat of a filibuster is frequently more effective than the filibuster itself. There was a tacit threat of a filibuster against the bill if title III was included; and as a result of the threat many Senators who, had it not been for that threat, would have voted for title III, voted against it, and it was eliminated from the bill. In return for this concession the other Senators from the South, with the exception of the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND], called off a possible filibuster against title IV.

Out of it we got some protection of voting rights, provided the Attorney General will actually take steps to seek injunctions restraining individuals or groups from interfering with the right to be registered or to vote.

I do not wish to be too censorious about the Attorney General. I can only say that up to date we have not seen much action in this direction. We hope there may be action later. But the point is that a large vacuum was left, and thus far the legislature has failed to take any action to implement the 14th amendment, so far as equal protection of the laws is concerned.

That is the real issue which lies behind this whole discussion. True, the filibuster has broad applications. It can prevent economic legislation which the vast majority desires, but the real epicenter, so to speak, of the movement to protect the filibuster comes from the fear that if it does not exist, a civil rights bill will be passed.

PROPOSED CIVIL RIGHTS BILL OF 1958 IS CONSTRUCTIVE AND ESSENTIAL MEASURE FOR EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS

The Senator from Illinois, in cooperation with a large number of other Senators, including the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE], the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], and others, has introduced what he regards as a modest civil rights proposal. It went before the Judiciary Committee in 1958. The Judiciary Committee—I think very mistakenly—decided not to hold hearings upon it. This is a very moderate bill.

I wish our southern friends would not get the idea that we are trying to persecute them or be rough on them. We know the problems they have, and we know that such problems are particularly acute in those States and counties where the percentage of Negroes is extremely high.

We also wish to make it clear that we hope there is not the slightest touch of self-righteousness in the proposals which we make. The people in the North are no more virtuous than the people of the South. In fact, while the slave trade brought the slaves to the South, Yankee captains usually commanded the slave ships which brought the slaves over.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Is it not a fact that in the Constitutional Convention the representatives from Virginia proposed that slavery be prohibited in the new Constitution after a given time, and that the representatives of the slave-trading States, including Massachusetts, said they would walk out, and there would be no Constitution?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I shall be glad to check that statement. I have always admired the humanitarianism of Jefferson, Madison, George Mason, and others. My only regret is that Virginia seems to have departed from the humane tradition of those great leaders.

Mr. ROBERTSON. If the Senator will yield, I think that statement was rather gratuitous.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator brought up the subject.

We in the North are fortunate from the standpoint of climate, history, and geography. The climate of the South, the heat, the richness of the soil, and the level qualities of the soil along the so-called Black Belt, made it more adaptable to slavery. Slavery emerged as an institution of the South; and although the slaves were freed, the problem of the Negroes remained.

I hope my friends from the South who now sit in the Chamber will not think that I am indulging in any language which reflects upon them when I say that one of the tragedies of the South is that its people are the prisoners both of geography and history.

Attitudes of mind and institutions have grown up which imprison the white population of the South; and yet they find themselves in a world in which men are insisting that they are human beings in the sight of God, entitled to respect as human souls, with a touch of the divine in them, and therefore deserve to be accorded the dignity which should be accorded to every human being.

OUR FAILURES TO GRANT EQUAL JUSTICE INJURE OUR NATION IN EYES OF OTHER PEOPLES

This is true not only of the United States, but of the world. The populations of Asia and Africa in the 19th century were held by the colonial nations of Europe, and the colonial nations of Europe not only imposed political domination over those areas, but they treated the people of those countries as social and cultural inferiors, and as social pariahs. This was bitterly resented and properly so.

The demand for independence in those areas is therefore not merely a demand for political independence, as was the case with Canada in the 19th century. Is is also the demand that the Chinese, the Indians, the Malays, the Arabs, and Africans be treated as human souls, treated with the dignity to which every human is entitled.

Because this country finds itself imprisoned by the past, despite the ideals which we profess in the Declaration of Independence and in the Constitution—and I wish to pay tribute to Jefferson, Madison, George Mason, and others—and despite the great progress which we have made, there are many of our institutions and practices which are at variance with this new belief in human dignity.

I do not wish to lecture my friends from the South, but everyone who travels knows that the greatest cross which the prestige of America has to bear is our treatment of the Negro. This is the question which the Indian throws at us, the question which the Malay throws at us, and in particular the question which the Africans throw at us. Africa, which was a dark and slumbering continent only a few years ago, is now emerging as a continent where new nations are springing into being and people are desiring political independence and treatment as individuals.

CONSTRUCTIVE NOT PUNITIVE LEGISLATION IS NEEDED

Under those circumstances, some of us believe that this question needs national attention, that the interests of America require the Federal Government to take affirmative action. We do not propose to humiliate the South. We want to aid those sections in the South which need aid, and we want to aid the fine people in the South who wish to effect a peaceful, humane transition from the old day to the new.

Some of the men and women whom I most admire are the liberals of the South, who see that the old path is wrong, and leads into a blind alley, and that if continued, it may lead to disaster and bloodshed. They are seeking a better way; but they find themselves in an area, which, dominated by the past, means that if they take forward steps they may lose their jobs, may lose their businesses, and almost certainly lose their reputations. These good people of the South need to be liberated. They are held at present in something of a prison. We want to liberate them. I say that not with any touch of self-righteousness, but with sincere desire.

The bill to which I have referred means to do just that. It provides that the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare will counsel with communities on effecting a more peaceful transition from segregation to desegregation. If such helpful facilities had been available in 1957, it may be that the head-on conflict at Little Rock could have been avoided. The people of Little Rock wanted to desegregate. The local government and the school board were sympathetic toward putting into effect a minimum program. However, public opinion in the community had not been organized to support it. It was possible, therefore, for extremists to sweep the community off its balance. That happened with tragic results for the Nation, tragic results for Little Rock and tragic results to the South.

Is it not much better to take counsel together and try to work out methods of transition? It can be done. Louisville did it. Other cities have done it. I notice the distinguished junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE], who has recently joined us, presiding in the chair. He comes from one of the fine cities of Indiana nearest to my State, and he has served as mayor of that fine city. He nods his head, and I take it to mean that Evansville has done it. Evansville is almost half a southern city. We have done it in my own State, in the southern portion of the State, which is primarily southern, rather than northern.

We want to be helpful. There are other provisions in the bill which state that if localities wish to desegregate—as is possible Norfolk does, and probably Arlington—and if financial aid is cut off by the States, the Federal Government will step in and make good the loss to the locality of State revenues. In other words, if the Federal Government insists on their obeying the Federal law, the Federal Government should have some responsibility for bearing the extra costs involved. Or if the expense of desegregation is greater than the cost of segregation, we believe the Federal Government should bear some of that cost.

It does not always follow that the cost of desegregation will be greater, because in many cases it will not be necessary to have a duplicate school system. It will not be necessary to build additional school buildings. It will be possible to use fewer school buildings and it may be possible to use fewer schoolteachers. In some cases however it will mean a greater cost, because what we do not want is to reduce the level of white education to the level which has been accorded to the Negroes. Rather, we would raise the level of Negro education to the level which applies in the case of white education. That may cost more money. Since it may entail added costs, we do not want to make a locality pay the full additional cost which may become necessary. In other words, we do not want virtue to be punished.

The Southern States, in proportion to their income, spend more for education than does the rest of the country. It is true that the level of education in the South is probably inferior to the average in the rest of the country. It is true that the average amount spent per pupil in the South is less than in the rest of the country. But that is merely because the per pupil income in the South is lower than in the North. In proportion to per pupil income, the Southern States as a whole spend a larger proportion of that income for education than other States in the Union, including even Massachusetts.

I do not wish my colleagues to think that I am castigating the South because of the lower level of education in the South. That is because of the lower economic prosperity in the South. Therefore, we in the North, or at least those who think as I do, believe that we should help bear a part of that burden.

BILL ALSO AUTHORIZES FEDERAL SUITS TO END DENIALS OF RIGHTS UNDER 14TH AMENDMENT

It is true that the bill contains straightforward language without any attempt to deceive, and without any casuistic declarations. We believe that the Department of Justice should take steps through proceedings in equity to enforce decisions of the United States Supreme Court. However, we limit that with the provision that the Department of Justice shall act only on the petition of an individual if that individual is found not to be financially or otherwise competent to carry the suit. Here we touch upon a matter which we dealt with in the basic voting rights bill in 1957.

I believe people can get justice in the Federal courts of this Nation. However, it is a costly business to get there.

I heard the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] say that if a bill is brought to a vote in the Senate, the Senate can pass any bill. Yes; but that is a big "if." Filibusters will not permit many bills to be brought to a vote. It is possible to get justice in the Federal courts provided a person has the necessary monetary resources to bring the suit to the Federal district court, through the circuit court, and to the Supreme Court. Those who do not have the money do not have an equal chance to get equal justice under law.

When the debate on the voting rights bill was under way, I quoted from Anatole France's "Red Lilly." In that book the great French satirist put into the mouth of one of his characters a statement on the equality of laws. He apotheosized the equality of laws when he said:

> The majestic equality of the laws forbid the rich as well as the poor from sleeping under bridges and begging in the streets for bread.

That is true. A Parisian millionaire who slept under one of the bridges which span the River Seine would be arrested for vagrancy. If he took his hat in hand and begged in the Place de l'Opera, he would also be arrested for vagrancy. But because of his income, he would not have to do either. However, the poor fellow who had to do it would be arrested.

The poor fellow without economic resources is behind the 8-ball. Negroes like that are at the bottom of the social scale in southern communities. They are employed by others, or their relatives are employed by others. They are looked down upon. To ask them to finance the fight for their own rights is like pitting a pygmy against a giant. The David and Goliath story is not repeated many times in American life.

To help themselves, they have organized the National Association for the Advancement of the Colored People, and have pooled their funds, obtained for the most part from northern cities. However, a series of antibarratry laws in the South make it a penal offense for anyone to give financial or legal assistance to those folks. Whether those laws are constitutional or not, I do not know. In other words, the Negro people of the South lack the resources, and the antibarratry laws make it a penal offense for anyone to come to their aid. That is the situation.

I happen to be one who believes that the Federal Government should not merely provide the tribunal before which their claims of justice can be argued, but also help them to state their case. I believe that we should have, so to speak, a legal-aid society attached to the Government. That principle is embodied in no less than 38 laws of this country. Perhaps the most notable is the Wages and Hours Act, which embodies this principle. That is what title III of the 1957 bill was all about, but it was very badly worded in its meaning. That is conceded. But the principle is openly stated in our bill. We believe it should be discussed and adopted on its merits and not put over by concealment. That is the same civil-rights bill which we introduced in 1958, and upon which hearings were not held.

I say to my southern friends that whatever the result of these votes may be, that bill will again be introduced this year. This is not a threat; it is a statement. We cannot dodge this issue any longer. The best interests of the Nation require action. We are willing to have it apply to the North as well as to the South.

Not only was the absence of slavery in the North due to historic and geographic reasons; but any superior practices which we have had in the North have been largely due to the fact that there have not been so many Negroes in the North. It is quite likely that if the proportions had been interchanged, we would have been just like the South.

There are many things wrong with our treatment of the Negro in the North which we should rectify; but there are some things in which we have progressed. Discrimination in the main against Negroes—not universally, but in the main—is practiced by private individuals without the sanction of law. We have removed legal disabilities, and we are moving pretty rapidly toward greater actual equality. Individuals can still have their choice as to what associations they wish to have. I do not think that right should be taken away. But we are moving, and we do not have an organized system of repression or second-class citizenship.

Where we can improve, where we are at fault compared with the national standards to which we should conform, the condition should be corrected. We welcome such correction.

This is the goal toward which the majority of people in this country are moving. Our good friends from the South sense that the enforcement of the 14th amendment may become a matter of congressional action, so they want to defend their institutions by the practice of the filibuster. That is their last resort to prevent action. I hope I have made it abundantly clear that we who are seeking a change in the filibuster rule are not proposing to eliminate debate. To the contrary, the explanation I gave a moment ago indicates that there could be 6 or 8 weeks of debate. If there are weaknesses in the bill, we want to have them revealed and discussed.

But we believe that discussion is not the end of legislative action. Discussion is a necessary prerequisite for wise action, so that truth and error can combat against each other. Sometimes what seems to be the truth turns out to have weaknesses in it. Those flaws can then be corrected. But after the discussion has gone on for some time, the Legislature has to act. Some time the roll has to be called. This action can be either positive—affirmative—or negative. For negative action—rejecting a bill—is action. That is what we are contending for.

MAJORITY RULE INTENDED BY CONSTITUTION

In a sense we should be a debating society here, a debating society affording far greater prolongation of debate than was granted in the Confederate Senate or is now granted in the legislatures of the Southern States. But we contend that this discussion should at some time eventuate in action if a majority of the Members of the Senate so desire.

I do not think much argument is needed, after what has been developed to prove that it was the desire of those who framed the Constitution of the United States that the majority should have the power to act except in those specific matters upon which other provisions were expressly made. A two-thirds vote is required for the overriding of vetoes, for the ratification of treaties, for the submission of amendments to the Constitution, for judicial or executive impeachment, and for expulsion. A two-thirds vote is specifically provided in those categories. But those are the only subjects upon which there is an express requirement for a two-thirds vote. In all other matters, where no other provision is contained, the assumption is that the will of the majority, as expressed in the ballot, is ultimately to prevail.

There is no exception which provides that the Senate rules shall be approved only by a two-thirds vote. That would be a self-imposed chain, one which we put upon ourselves.

There is no provision that civil rights shall be required to have a two-thirds vote, or a two-thirds ability to break a filibuster, perhaps I should say.

Therefore, we say that so far from being indefensible extremists, we are founding our contention both in the resolution now before the Senate and in the proposed legislation which we intend later to submit upon the principles of the Constitution. That is our purpose.

I conclude with one further remark. I admire the southern ability, the southern graciousness, the southern kindliness when expressed in given channels. I think that if the South were once free, or partially free, from this incubus which hangs over it, then the great talents, the great political talents, of the South could be used in a constructive instead of in a destructive fashion.

It hurts me when I think of what is happening in many States. It hurts me not merely to think of what is happening to Negroes; it hurts me to think of what is happening to the whites. We want to free the talents of moderates, liberals, conservative-liberals, liberal-conservatives, and others in the South for the great tasks of effecting a transition from the old order to the new order, and to conserve the interests of the American people at home and abroad.

This has been a rather lengthy speech, Mr. President, and it has been delivered without many notes. I hope that if there is roughness of expression, I may be pardoned.

EXHIBIT I

LIMITATION ON DEBATE IN THE SENATE

(Extracts from individual views of Mr. HAYDEN included in the report of the Committee on Rules and Administration on S. Res. 25 amending rule XXII relating to cloture, 80th Cong., 1st sess., April 3, 1947)

From 1806 to 1917, a period of 111 years, there was no limitation of debate in the Senate. Thirty years ago Senate Rule XXII, in its present form, was adopted. In order that the Senate may determine whether that rule should be changed, it is proper to ascertain its origin and how it has actually operated.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 8, 1917, shows that a resolution (S. Res. 5) containing the rule was presented by Senator Martin of Virginia, the majority leader, who obtained unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. The primary reason for proposing a limitation of debate was a filibuster which resulted in the failure to pass the armed merchant ship bill before the adjournment of the 64th Congress on March 4, 1917.

Senator Curtis, of Kansas, the minority leader, stated: "I am heartily in favor of this resolution which proposes to amend the rules of the Senate so that debate may be closed. * * * The change proposed by the resolution was agreed to by a joint committee of the majority and minority."

The Martin resolution was the subject of discussion in the Senate from noon until nearly midnight, when rule XXII was adopted by a vote of yeas 76, to nays 3. The three Senators who voted against the resolution were Gronna, of North Dakota; La Follette, of Wisconsin; and Sherman, of Illinois. While the rollcall was in progress announcements were made that of the 16 Senators who were absent 12 would have voted for the Martin resolution, if present.

During the debate Senator Sherman, of Illinois, stated:

"If this change is made it can or will be done by a majority vote of the Senate. A quorum being present, 49 or more, 25 or more, will adopt it. It provides that on the application of 16 Senators they may in effect by a two-thirds vote bring any pending measure within the time named in the rule, a very short one, to a rollcall.

"If it can be done by a two-thirds vote, and such a rule changed by a majority vote, to begin with, and another rule can be adopted, either today or at any time hereafter, by which the change of the rule can be made by a mere majority on the application of 16 Senators or fewer—by a mere majority, let it be remembered—and the two-thirds rule will be abolished."

Mr. Hardwick, of Georgia: "I am going to invite the Senator's attention to this fact, however: While it is true that the rules might be changed by a majority, yet you never would be able to get a vote on a proposition to change the rule unless two-thirds agreed to close debate on that proposition. So it amounts to the same thing."

Mr. Sherman: "But the Senator must bear in mind that when the precedent is established that two-thirds can bring a question of amending the rules to a rollcall, the proposed amendment itself can be adopted by a majority vote. That is the statement, and it will be the ruling of the Senate when the final decision comes. I only request the Senator to wait and see whether this rule itself will not in turn be some time amended by a mere majority vote."

Mr. Hardwick: "But it will always take two-thirds to bring the debate to an end, even on a proposition to change the rules."

THE UNDERWOOD RESOLUTION

The first attempt to modify rule XXII was of a temporary nature. Senator Underwood of Alabama introduced Senate Resolution 235 on May 4, 1818, which was reported from the Committee on Rules on May 31, modified so as to read:

"Resolved, That during the period of the present war the rules of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following:

" 'That no Member shall occupy more than 1 hour in debate, except by unanimous consent, on any bill or resolution and not over 20 minutes on each amendment proposed thereto.' "

The following extracts are taken from remarks in opposition made by Senators during the course of the debate on Senate Resolution 235:

William Alden Smith, a Senator from Michigan, 1907–19:

"The proposed new rule is intended to curtail the individual right and power of Senators. How can a Senator represent his State appropriately in a crisis if a few Senators may decree in caucus and then absent themselves, leaving the State to its fate, shorn of the power to be effective?

"The instances where this rule of unlimited debate has been abused and has worked to the disadvantage of the Government are very rare indeed and the cases where it has been of tremendous advantage to the Government and to the people of the United States can be counted by hundreds and hundreds.

"The longer I stay here the less I speak. Some of the best men who ever served in this body have grown to dislike verbal controversy.

"Men get over the fascination of their own speech; but if the occasion should require, or if some injustice was sought to be done, unlimited debate would be a very desirable and potential weapon to reside in the senatorship.

"It is not that a Senator wishes to be heard at great length; it is the power to defend his State which you are attempting to curtail.

"Take away the right of unlimited debate and you take away the one great distinguishing characteristic of senatorial procedure."

Jacob H. Gallinger, a Senator from New Hampshire, 1891–1918:

"A great deal of agitation had been heard at varying times concerning the necessity for having some rule that would limit debate. There were those of us who did not think any rule at all was necessary. There were others who thought a somewhat drastic rule necessary. I speak now advisedly, as a member of the Committee on Rules, when I say that that rule was adopted as a compromise rule, and assurances were given that if it should be agreed to—as it was, without any controversy—it would end this matter of so-called cloture legislation. It has answered its purpose.

"During my somewhat protracted membership of this body a few filibusters have been engaged in. I was the victim of one of those filibusters, Mr. President. A bill in which I was deeply interested, which had been debated for weeks in this body, as I remember it, was at the end of a session defeated by a filibuster.

"At that time I felt very keenly on the subject but, when I came to look it all over, I was led to the conclusion that the evils that grew out of our present system were insignificant compared to the benefits that grew out of it.

"I think I have myself participated in two filibusters during the time I have been a Member of this body, and I have never had occasion to regret it. I believed that they were justified. I believe that great good came to the country because of those protracted discussions."

Henry Cabot Lodge, a Senator from Massachusetts, 1893–1924:

"The case for free debate in the Senate has never been better stated that in a paragraph I am about to read from a well-known book. It is there said:

" 'It is the proper duty of a representative body to look diligently into every affair of government and to talk much about what it sees. It is meant to be the eyes and the voice, and to embody the wisdom and will of its constituents. Unless Congress have and use every means of acquainting itself with the acts and the disposition of the administrative agents of the Government, the country must be helpless to learn how it is being served; and unless Congress both scrutinize these things and sift them by every form of discussion the country must remain in embarrassing, crippling ignorance of the very affairs which it is most important that it should understand and direct.

" 'The informing function of Congress should be preferred even to its legislative function. The argument is not only that discussed and interrogated administration is the only pure and efficient administration, but more than that, that the only really self-governing people is that people which discusses and interrogates its administration. The talk on the part of Congress which we sometimes justly condemn is the profitless squabble of words over frivolous bills or selfish party issues. It would be hard to conceive of there being too much talk about the practical concerns and processes of government. Such talk it is which, when earnestly and purposefully conducted, clears the public mind and shapes the demands of public opinion.' "

"That, Mr. President, is taken from 'Congressional Government,' pages 303 and 304, written by the present President of the United States [Woodrow Wilson], and I think it would not be easy to find a more powerful exposition of that necessity for debate which, I think, is infringed on by this proposed rule."

Warren G. Harding, a Senator from Ohio, 1915–20:

"I have been hearing about the reformation of the Senate since I first entered politics; and it was rather an ironical thing the other day that one of the most emphatic speeches made in favor of the adoption of this rule was uttered by the very latest arrival in this body.

"But the reformation of the Senate has long been a fad. I came here myself under the impression that there ought to be cloture and limitations on debate; and the longer I sit in this body, the more convinced do I become that the freedom of debate in the United States Senate is one of the highest guarantees we have of our American institutions.

"Mr. President, before I take my seat I wish to say that the length of a speech is not the measure of its merit.

"While the Senate may not listen, because the Senate does not listen very attentively to anybody, I discover, though Congress may not be apparently concerned and though the galleries of this body may not be filled to add their inspiring attention, I charge you now, Mr. President, that the people of the United States of America will be listening. This is the one central point, the one open forum, the one place in America where there is freedom of debate, which is essential to an enlightened and dependable public sentiment, the guide of the American Republic."

Charles E. Townsend, a Senator from Michigan, 1911–23:

"It will be a sad day for our Republic when the Senate ceases to be a free and open forum.

"When I was a Member of the other House, to me one of the attractive features of service in the Senate was that there was an opportunity for debate and full consideration. I did not expect to abuse that privilege, and I never have done so.

"Most new Senators are instinctively for re-forming the rules.

"We have been in the habit of condemning long speeches sometimes and I confess that at times I have criticized them, too; but I have recalled that subsequent events have shown that many Senators were right in appealing to the Senate to consider the question under discussion, and it was their duty to make those appeals to the Senate if by doing so they had any hope of changing the sentiments of the Senators."

James E. Watson, a Senator from Indiana, 1916–33:

"If this had been the rule of the U.S. Senate for the first 50 years of its existence John C. Calhoun would not have been able to thunder forth the doctrines in which he believed; Hayne could not have announced on the floor the ideas which he so eloquently espoused; Henry Clay would have been unable to deliver in full any one of the score of speeches that accomplished so much for his country; and Daniel Webster, imperious orator of American history, could not have blazed the pathway of the future in that historic utterance in which he announced the essential policies of the Republic if its institutions are to endure, for on the floor of the U.S. Senate and in the open forum of debate he in a sense shaped the destiny of the Republic and molded the future of the Nation.

Mr. Gallinger: "Speaking for 8 hours."

Mr. Watson: "And 8 hours, the Senator from New Hampshire informs me, he spent in delivering that masterful oration.

"If this had been the rule of the Senate even in our day, the great debates that have occurred upon the financial and economic problems which have engaged the thought and attention of the Republic could not have taken place to the full.

Reed Smoot, a Senator from Utah, 1903–33:

"The passage of this resolution means that running debate will be closed in the future, and I say now that there has been more information given to Senators, actual information, information that affected the votes of Senators, more real information gained, in a running debate where questions are freely asked, than there is in all the set speeches that were ever made in this body."

James D. Phelan, a Senator from California, 1915–21:

"It is the history of this body that there are empty benches occasionally when a Senator exceeds what, in the judgment of the absentees, may be a reasonable time limit. I believe it was held in the House of Commons that, whereas a man had a right to speak, he had no right to be heard.

"The Senate rules serve by arresting hasty action. Members of the House have appealed to me to save the power of the Senate on which the Members of the House themselves so often rely. On it the country relies to have time to deliberate and if necessary protest.

"Men are carried away by passion, heat, and rancor, and they enact laws thoughtlessly; again they enact laws ignorantly. Debate restrains passion; debate restrains heat; debate restrains rancor, and at the same time debate commands deliberation. Therefore I oppose the arbitrary rule and stand for the power and dignity of the Senate which has served the country so well in this war."

Frank B. Brandegee, a Senator from Connecticut, 1905–24:

"Mr. President, I look at this right of debate not as a right, much less a privilege, which we are conferring upon ourselves as a matter of favor. I look upon it as a right which attaches to the sovereign States of this Union, each of which is represented here by 2 Senators, and whose sole method of putting its case before the people of the United States and before this body is through the voice of its 2 Senators.

"So I say that this is the forum of the States. This is a federated Government, in which the States reserved the right of equal suffrage in the Senate of the United States, and made that the only provision of the Constitution which never should be subject to amendment."

VICE PRESIDENT DAWES

At the beginning of a special session of the Senate on March 4, 1925, Charles G. Dawes, who took the oath that day as Vice President, delivered an address to the Senate in which he said:

"Reform in the present rules of the Senate is demanded not only by American public opinion, but I venture to say in the individual consciences of a majority of the Members of the Senate itself."

With special reference to rule XXII, the new President of the Senate stated:

"That rule which at times enables Senators to consume in oratory those last precious minutes of a session needed for momentous decisions, places in the hands of one or of a minority of Senators a greater power than the veto power of the President of the United States, which is limited in its effectiveness by the necessity of an affirmative two-thirds vote.

Lynn Haines, the editor of a monthly publication, "The Searchlight on Congress," wrote letters to each Member of the Senate asking for a statement as to his opinion of the proposal of Vice President Dawes. The following are extracts from some of the replies printed in the May 1925 issue of that publication:

William E. Borah, a Senator from Idaho, 1907–40:

"I do not know what changes Vice President Dawes proposes with reference to the Senate rules. In a general way it seems that he would adopt strict cloture. I am opposed to cloture in any form.

"I have never known a good measure killed by a filibuster or a debate. I have known of a vast number of bad measures, unrighteous measures, which could not have been killed in any other way except through long discussion and debate.

"There is nothing in which sinister and crooked interests, seeking favorable legislation, are more interested right now than in cutting off discussion in Washington."

Smith W. Brookhart, a Senator from Iowa, 1922–33:

"I do not think the Senate rule of unlimited debate will be materially changed. It is this rule that makes the United States Senate the one great open legislative forum in all the world.

"The rule sometimes delays good legislation, but never kills it. Good legislation always comes back, and finally wins. The rule kills a great deal of bad legislation. That class of legislation which cannot stand the light of publicity will always be killed by unlimited debate."

THE SECOND UNDERWOOD RESOLUTION

On June 4, 1926, Senator Oscar W. Underwood, of Alabama, moved that consideration be given to Senate Resolution 225 which he had introduced on May 17 to amend the rules of the Senate to provide that:

"Whenever a bill raising revenue or a general appropriation bill has been under consideration by the Senate for more than 1 calendar day, as relating to such bills, there shall be a motion for the previous question, which, being ordered by a majority of Senators voting, if a quorum is present, shall have the effect to cut off all debate and bring the Senate to a direct vote upon the immediate question or questions on which it has been asked and ordered. * * *

Joseph T. Robinson, a Senator from Arkansas, 1913–37:

"The filibuster has been invoked comparatively few times in the history of the country, and every time it has been invoked and proved successful it has been justified in the judgment and in the conviction of the public. If it had not been for the filibuster that the Senator from Alabama himself waged, which he led and of which he boasted, we would not have been able to defeat a bill which authorized the Federal Government to permit judgments in damages against counties and municipalities for no alleged wrongful act, a bill which took away from the local governmental institutions the few remaining powers which they are permitted to exercise.

"The force bill would have become a law but for the organized and persistent opposition of Senators who saw in its provisions dangers to the fundamental institutions of this Republic. They defeated it by fighting and falling back and fighting again until the hosts which were assaulting them realized that the attack had failed."

Mr. Reed of Missouri: "The late Senator Lodge, sponsor for what is called the force bill, years afterward, indeed, only a year or two before his lamentable death, stated to me upon the floor of the Senate that he was convinced that the force bill was wrong and that the result of the filibuster had been a great blessing to the country."

"Mr. Robinson: Of course, the rules could be amended and improved, but that, Mr. President, is not the question. The proposition is, 'Shall the voice of the people through their Senators be stifled and suppressed?' I care not whether Senators come from New England or from the South, whether they come from the West or from the East the proposition is that here is one forum which, under traditions and precedents, affords an opportunity for the public to have expression of its views through the representatives of the people.

"When I recall the fact that under the rules of the House of Representatives one man on one side and another man on the other side, frequently both of them, really agreeing as to the proposition in dispute, actually control all the time that is allotted; that no Member may speak except by permission of someone else, and that his only remedy is to print in the RECORD a speech which frequently he himself does not comprehend and which nobody on God's earth will ever read, I am willing to vindicate this forum of open debate where fools may be arrogant, but where men who have studied problems still have a chance to speak."

James A. Reed, a Senator from Missouri, 1911–29:

"Cloture means the granting of a power. Whenever you grant a power you must assume that the power will be exercised. So, when we discuss this proposed rule, we must do so in the light, not of how it may be exercised so as to do no harm, but we must consider how it may be exercised to do harm.

"I need not pause to add to the argument already made, that when it is proposed to bring in a great measure involving the expenditure of vast sums of money, if it be a bill for the appropriation of money, or a bill for the collection of taxes from the entire country, affecting intimately the industries of the country, an hour's debate upon such a bill is utterly insufficient, utterly inadequate, and that a rule limiting debate to 1 hour would mean the end of debate. The truth is that this measure, if adopted, will empower a majority to throttle freedom of speech upon this floor and enable sinister and wicked measures to be carried to consummation without the country being advised of the inequities they bear.

"Gag rule is the last resort of the legislative scoundrel. Gag rule is the surest device of the rascal who presides over a political convention and proposes to accomplish something which will not bear discussion. Gag rule is the thing that men inexperienced in legislative proceedings always advocate at first, and if they have any sense, nearly always retire from as gracefully as possible after they have seen it in operation.

"There is justification for unlimited debate in this body. I am getting a little tired of hearing about the sacred rights of the majority; that this is a country ruled by the majority; and that the majority has the right to have its way. This is not a country ruled by the majority. This is not a country of majority rule. The Constitution of the United States was written, in large part, to prevent majority rule. The Declaration of Independence was an announcement that there are limitations upon majority rule.

"MAJORITY RULE

"Majority rule. Where is the logic or the reason to be found back of majority rule except in the mere necessity to dispatch business? The fact that a majority of 1 or 10 vote for a bill in the Senate is not a certification that the action is right. The majority has been wrong oftener than it has been right in all the course of time. The majority crucified Jesus Christ. The majority burned the Christians at the stake. The majority drove the Jews into exile and the ghetto. The majority established slavery. The majority set up innumerable gibbets. The majority chained to stakes and surrounded with circles of flame martyrs through all the ages of the world's history.

"Majority rule without any limitation or curb upon the particular set of fools who happen to be placed for the moment in charge of the machinery of a government. The majority grinned and jeered when Columbus said the world was round. The majority threw him into a dungeon for having discovered a new world. The majority said that Galileo must recant or that Galileo must go to prison. The majority cut off the ears of John Pym because he dared advocate the liberty of the press. The majority to the south of the Mason and Dixon's line established the horrible thing called slavery, and the majority north of it did likewise and only turned reformer when slavery ceased to be profitable to them.

"FREEDOM

"What is it has made this race great? It has not been the proud blood of any illustrious ancestry; it has not been because we could trace our lineage back to kings and a royal household; it has not been because of the peculiar graces or abilities of those immigrants who came to our shores and from whose loins we are sprung. It is simply because for once in the history of the world the chains were taken from the arms, the shackles from the brain, the shadows of fear were dissipated by the sunlight of liberty and freedom, and every brain of every human being, great or small, was at liberty to function, every arm and every limb was at liberty to move. So we unleashed the latent powers of a race of people; and from the cottage of poverty there came forth the genius, and from the house of the man of humble estate there emerged the child who could turn the dull and inexpressive canvas into pictured harmony of color, light, and shade, and paint the rainbow's mingling hues and marvelous tints.

"From the cottages of the impoverished, from the homes of ancestors who had been enslaved and enthralled, there came forth children who in the full liberty of our civilization were able to attack every problem and to undertake every great vocation of life; so that within one generation of time we produced here orators whose words of flame could fire the hearts of all the people of this land; poets whose words will be read so long as men shall love the music of our tongue, and a citizenry who have defended our soil and our flag with unexampled valor in every contest of this Republic. All these triumphs of intellect, all these great advances in the arts and in the sciences, all our wondrous advance in wealth are due to one great fact; that we have allowed the individual in this land the opportunity to develop, the opportunity to express himself.

FREE DEBATE

"Mr. President, what has this to do with the question I am discussing? Everything, sir. Before any law to bind 110 million people could be passed it should somewhere be subjected to free debate; somewhere it should encounter opposition; somewhere the fires of keen intellects should burn their heat about it and test it for its metal; somewhere and somehow it should be determined by all that the intellect can do and all that the tongue can express, whether the particular law which is proposed is fit to be insisted, be fastened upon 110 million people who think they are free and who once were free. That one forum reserved of all the places in the world is the Senate of the United States. Here a man can stand and express his views until exhaustion comes. And what of it? Some rules of common sense and decency and gentlemanly conduct have their effect. Not in all the nearly 16 years I have sat in this body have I ever seen but two or three instances of what might be really called a filibuster.

"Time and time again I have seen the opportunity under the rules for the minority to have stood and obstructed legislation, but as soon as debate was fairly over they have invariably given way and the vote has come. In the two or three instances which I remember a very simple expedient was adopted. Freedom of speech was not denied, but continuance of speech was demanded. It was insisted that the bill was before the Senate and that the opponents or advocates of the bill should speak for or against it and that no other business should intervene.

"We have been told here of two or three bills—one of them the force bill. The force bill, if it had been enacted, would have kept alive the fires of hatred between the North and the South almost as bright and as keen and as hot as they were at the close of the great civil strife.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA

"Another example: It was sought here to admit New Mexico to statehood as a partisan measure and under a constitution that had been written by the corporations of New Mexico. It was insisted upon the other hand that New Mexico should not come into the Union except under a fairly adopted constitution, and that at the same time Arizona should be received. What happened? One or two men stood here and held their ground; and a short space of time, a few months, rolling by, both States were received into the Union with proper constitutions.

"Sir, I know it is popular to attack the Senate. So many an ass has stood and brayed at the lions. He who would claim for this body perfection would prove himself a fool. But the more imperfect we are, the more we need to counsel and to take advice. The less we know, the more we ought to strive to know. There may be some men of such supernatural power of intellect that they can gain nothing by the discussions their fellows may produce; but I have never seen an important bill upon the floor of the Senate, unless there was some political organization in control determined to pass it without the dotting of an 'i' or the crossing of a 't,' that has not been amended and amended to its benefit.

A FREE FORUM

"As long as we can keep this forum free, as long as a vigorous and determined minority can prevent the passage of a statute, so long as this country will be safe, reasonably safe, at least, for no great act of treachery can ever be consummated where there are not some brave souls to stand in its resistance and to stand to the end.

"But strike down this safeguard of public discussion, apply the gag, and imagine, if you please, that it is to be applied only to pass good measures, only to accomplish the virtuous and the wise and the holy, only to bring the thing of rectitude; imagine that, if you please. He is a fool, he is every kind of a fool, that has ever cursed this earth or cursed himself, who thinks that any power will always be used wisely and justly. Power is almost invariably abused."

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, it is ironic that speeches of the kind which the Senator from Illinois has just made should so often be made to an almost empty chamber. During the day, apparently we do not have time to listen to such fine addresses. It is speeches such as this which, if anything warrants it, warrant for the Senate the title of the greatest deliberative body in the world.

If I am a little personal, I know the Senator from Illinois will forgive me; but I do not know a more honest man than the Senator from Illinois, a man more free from hypocrisy of any kind. Surely, he is a passionate man, sometimes partisan, but only in a proper sense. Because I have been so deeply moved by his speech tonight, I shall not take exception to the one or two little things which seemed to me to be slightly partisan in his remarks, so overshadowed have they been by the sweep and depth of what he had to say.

The Senator from Illinois is right when he says that the issue before the Senate is civil rights. He is right, too, in saying that there are those of us—and I think we are in the majority in Congress, both in the Senate and in the House—who do not think of civil rights in political terms; who do not believe in civil rights publicly and eschew them privately; who do not think of civil rights as a means of political advantage. I do not think such a contention can properly be made. I have never seen any political advantage derived; I have seen a lot of political disadvantage. There are those of us who regard this matter as the greatest moral issue of our time, the greatest social issue, at least so far as our domestic life is concerned.

We are not in any sense looking down our noses at any other part of the country, particularly at our friends from the South, who suffer under this shame, which is not of their making, but is of their inheritance. But when the Senator from Illinois said that they are held in the grip of this awful thing, they are. They have to be. It is not that they want to be. They have to use every parliamentary device and practice to prevent action on any bill which anyone might even call, whether it is or not, a bill relating to civil rights.

Unless we are able to make it impossible for them to use parliamentary tricks and devices, they will be obliged to use them.

The bill the Senator from Illinois is about to reintroduce, with cosponsorship by the Senator from New Jersey and other Senators, is a step in the right direction, insofar as civil rights are concerned.

Mr. President, I predict that if we do not succeed in bringing about a more effective amendment to rule XXII, neither that bill as a whole nor any substantial part of it will ever see the light of day in either this Congress or a subsequent Congress. That will not happen until an amendment of rule XXII that is really effective is made.

So let the country know and ponder over the weekend, if it hears what we say here, that what we are talking about is civil rights. We favor the enactment of legislation not vengeful in any sense, but legislation which is necessary, and which will be a step in the right direction, and will prove the decency of American life, and will make it possible for a great section of the country to become wholly a part of the country.

I thank the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT TO 10 O'CLOCK A.M. MONDAY

During the delivery of Mr. DOUGLAS' speech,

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; with the understanding that I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes; with that understanding.

Mr. President, am I correctly informed that the Senator from Illinois and the Senators who are associated with him on the amendment do not desire the Senate to hold a session tomorrow?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Let me say that if the Senator from Texas wishes to hold a session on tomorrow, Saturday, we shall be perfectly willing to be here then. We are ready to be present whenever the Senator from Texas suggests. But if he does not desire to have the Senate hold a session on tomorrow, we shall acquiesce.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It is totally immaterial to me whether the Senate meets tomorrow or does not meet. I understood that certain Senators desired to speak tomorrow, perhaps including the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK]. However, I have conferred with him. If no Senator now desires to address the Senate tomorrow, we are prepared to propose that the Senate not hold a session Saturday. On the other hand, I am committed to having the Senate hold a Saturday session if any Senator desires one; and I wish to keep faith with those with whom I am dealing.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That course would be acceptable, because we do not wish to put the Senator from Texas at a disadvantage in connection with this matter. So I would not insist on the holding of a Saturday session, if the Senator from Texas does not desire one to be held.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The matter is wholly immaterial to me.

Mr. President, in light of the agreement which now has been entered into, and which will be in effect on Monday, and in view of the fact that I am informed that no Senator on either side of the aisle has expressed a wish to speak on Saturday, I ask unanimous consent that the order that the Senate convene at 10 o'clock tomorrow, Saturday, be rescinded and that an order be entered following the adjournment of the Senate today, it meet on Monday, at 10 o'clock a.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LAUSCHE in the chair). Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this colloquy be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

During Mr. DOUGLAS' speech,

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me, to permit me to request the Chair to lay before the Senate three resolutions which have come from the House of Representatives with respect to the death of Members of that body—with the understanding that in yielding for that purpose he will not lose his right to the floor, and that the proceedings in connection with those measures will be printed in the RECORD following his remarks?

Mr. DOUGLAS. With that understanding, Mr. President, I yield.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE EBERHARTER, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate the resolutions coming from the House of Representatives relating to the death of Members of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from the House of Representatives, which will be read:

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Honorable HERMAN P. EBERHARTER, a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That the clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution, and ask that it may be immediately considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 13) as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. HERMAN P. EBERHARTER, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate, at the conclusion of its business today, adjourn until 10 a.m. on Monday next.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, for the RECORD, I should like to say a brief word of tribute to a distinguished Member of the other body, HERMAN P. EBERHARTER, who labored in the vineyard of good government, and liberal government, for many a long year; who, despite a crippling illness, and frequently despite considerable physical pain, stuck to the job, and did his duty for his constituents and for the people of his Commonwealth.

The House of Representatives has sustained a loss in the death of my good friend. Allegheny County and the city of Pittsburgh have sustained a substantial loss.

I should like to pay my own personal tribute to a man who served his city, his State, and his country well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE SIMPSON, OF ILLINOIS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Honorable SID SIMPSON, a Representative from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution, and ask that it be read and immediately considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 14) as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. SID SIMPSON, late a Representative from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate, at the conclusion of its business today, adjourn until 10 a.m. on Monday next.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, the late SID SIMPSON was a Representative from the State of Illinois for a period of 16 years, from the famous Illinois 20th District. It had always been a Democratic district. It was the district from which Henry T. Rainey was sent for many years. Representative Rainey, in due course of time, became Speaker of the House of Representatives, and died while he was in that office. Speaker Rainey was succeeded as a Representative by Scott Lucas, my good friend, who served with great distinction and credit not only in the House, but in the Senate to which he was elected in 1938 and where he served 12 more years. Following Scott Lucas, the late James M. Barnes was elected as a Representative of the district for two terms.

SID SIMPSON was elected in 1942, and we were never able to take the district away from him. He won no less than eight consecutive elections. This was a district which we had always regarded as strongly Democratic, a district which generally voted Democratic for other offices, but not Democratic for a Representative to Congress when SID SIMPSON was running.

I disagreed with the political views of Mr. SIMPSON, but I, as did everyone else, liked him as a person. That was the general sentiment of the people of the 20th District.

In my opinion, he would have been unbeatable so long as he lived and so long as he desired to run for reelection.

He was a good man, without the slightest touch of viciousness in him—generous, kindly, anxious to help people, and an extremely good citizen, who had a good father and good mother, and who was a credit to our country and to our State.

The loss has been very heavy. He has been succeeded by his widow, so the name of SID SIMPSON is continued from the 20th District.

I wish to join with his many friends in paying my respects to his fine qualities.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. I desire to associate myself wholeheartedly with the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Illinois in regard to SID SIMPSON. I was a colleague of his in the House for the whole time I was in the House. He was a warm and close friend of mine, and a man for whom I had the deepest affection and respect.

Everything the Senator from Illinois has said about SID SIMPSON as a person is true, and is known to be true by his thousands of friends and all his associates.

I join with the Senator from Illinois in expressing my condolences to his family and to all of those close to him. He was a man we could not well afford to lose, and whom we shall find it very hard to replace.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN subsequently said: Mr. President, I understand that while I was in a committee session some words were spoken about our late lamented colleague, SID SIMPSON, of Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I have known SID SIMPSON for a long, long time. To me he was one of the most gracious characters I ever knew. One testimony to him is that without compensation and only because of his fealty to party ideals he served, I think, as a precinct committeeman in the State for as long as anyone I can remember. I think it is a great testimony to any individual that he would take a humble party position and pursue it with great fidelity year after year, season in and season out, and do it only because of his interest in government and interest in politics in the very finest sense, believing, of course, that he could make a contribution to the wellbeing of the country.

One need not look very far for the reasons which compelled the electorate in the district to return SID SIMPSON to Washington term after term for a great many years. He was gracious, kindly, Christian, with a very fine family, whose friends were legion. We mourn his passing.

I was delighted indeed that the tradition of the district was carried on by the election of Mrs. EDNA SIMPSON, his widow, to the place SID SIMPSON occupied in the Congress. A rather interesting commentary is the fact that he passed away, as I recall, about 10 days before election day, and it became necessary to make some very hasty moves under the State law in order to engross the name of Mrs. SIMPSON upon the ballot, yet with so little preparation I think she was elected to the position she now occupies in the Congress by a majority in excess of 15,000 votes. It is a testimony to the Simpson name and to SID SIMPSON, who so effectively and so courageously represented the people of that district for a great many terms in the House of Representatives. As I say, we mourn his passing and we revere his memory as a statesman, as a fine citizen, a fine family man, and as a very durable friend.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE McGREGOR, OF OHIO

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming from the House of Representatives which will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Honorable J. HARRY MCGREGOR, a Representative from the State of Ohio.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution, and ask that it be read and immediately considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 15) as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. J. HARRY MCGREGOR, late a Representative from the State of Ohio.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate, at the conclusion of its business today, adjourn until 10 a. m. on Monday next.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I ask my colleagues to join in adopting the resolution which will express condolences to the family and friends of J. HARRY MCGREGOR, who recently passed away.

Mr. MCGREGOR was not of my political party, but I knew him intimately. He lived in an area where he was highly respected, especially by those who knew him. No finer tribute can be paid to him than to say that in biennium after biennium the people of the area in which he lived and served expressed unlimited confidence in him as a person and as a public official. Those who knew him best loved him most. He passed away at a comparatively early age after serving in the U.S. Congress for many years. His passing has been a loss not only to his family and to his friends but to the State of Ohio and to the Nation.

I ask my colleagues to agree to the resolution paying condolences to the family and friends at his passing.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleagues on this side of the aisle I want to join in the statement and the expression of sympathy, respect, and admiration which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] has made in regard to our late colleague, HARRY MCGREGOR of Ohio.

As was the case with respect to SID SIMPSON, I served in the House for many years with HARRY MCGREGOR. For him I had, as did all his colleagues, affection, respect, and admiration. He was a good Member of Congress and a good citizen. He was a fine person, a happy and cheerful person, whose influence and whose touch on others' lives always brightened theirs. We shall miss him deeply.

On behalf of all my colleagues on this side of the aisle I join in the expression of the deepest grief, regret, and sympathy to the members of his family and his colleagues at his passing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES

During the delivery of Mr. DOUGLAS' speech,

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Illinois yield to the junior Senator from Virginia, without losing his right to the floor, so that I may make a brief speech?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the junior Senator from Virginia with the understanding that I shall not lose my right to the floor and with the further understanding that the remarks of the Senator from Virginia will be printed in the RECORD after the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I rise today, as I have on several previous occasions during my 12 years of service in this body, to defend the integrity of the U.S. Senate as a keystone in our system of constitutional government.

As I shall point out in the course of these remarks, the United States of America became a constitutionally bound political unit only through agreement of 13 independent States on a compromise plan. An essential feature of that plan was a Senate in which the largest and smallest States would be equally represented and in which minority rights would be fully protected. Changing our rules to allow a mere majority to stifle open protests of a minority would be a repudiation of the "great compromise" accepted by the Founding Fathers.

In opposing any such change, I speak as a representative of Virginia, which never would have ratified the Constitution without its built-in checks and balances and the additional assurance of prompt adoption of a Bill of Rights. And if Virginia, with her great influence, exercised through men like George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, and James Madison, had refused to ratify, the effort for union would have failed.

But I speak also for all those who believe in the sacredness of individual rights and who realize that those rights must have certain safeguards beyond the simple principle of majority rule.

The danger of a change in procedure which would erode and threaten to destroy the function of the Senate as a deliberative body should be recognized by thinking persons as outweighing temporary advantages which partisans would gain in obtaining prompt action on a few items of politically profitable legislation. And even those partisan advocates of change who might find themselves able to ride roughshod over a helpless minority today might themselves be on the losing side tomorrow and might then regret surrender of any part of the right to discuss questions of principle for as long as is necessary to make the people of the Nation realize fully what is involved.

What I have said about the changing fortunes of majorities and minorities under our system of party government should be obvious to members of a group which was materially reduced in the last election, but the facts should not be ignored by those now flushed with recent victory who could find their own circumstances changed at some future date.

Regardless of my rights under the Senate rules, it is not my intention to speak at length on this occasion. I want to discuss briefly, however, the following points:

First. A material limitation on Senate debate—and permitting cloture by majority vote would impose a material limitation—would be contrary to the basic philosophy of our plan of government. It would violate the spirit of the compact which made our constitutional Union possible. It would upset the carefully contrived balance among the branches of our Government. It would reduce the effectiveness of the Senate as a guardian of States rights and individual liberties.

Second. It is unnecessary to change the rules under which the Senate has functioned satisfactorily for a century and a half. The present cloture rule gives adequate protection against abuse of the privilege of extended debate by a few willful men. No important legislation has been permanently blocked by filibusters.

Third. Allowing a majority to cut off Senate debate would be a dangerous expedient because the weapon forged against one area of the country and one viewpoint could readily be turned against any other section or minority interest. Those who call themselves liberals should be especially careful, because in the past they have been the chief beneficiaries of a system which allows untrammeled expression of unpopular views.

It is extremely important for us to consider proposed changes in our rules not from the standpoint of immediate expediency but in the light of the background and traditions of this body and with an eye on the future.

Unlike many of our institutions, the Senate was not established as a copy of some existing governmental unit. It was uniquely and carefully designed, after long and arduous debate, to meet the specific needs of 13 proudly independent States which were willing to surrender to a Union only so much of their sovereignty as was essential to promote their common welfare.

The attitude with which the making of our Constitution was approached is evident from the language of the resolution of Congress adopted February 21, 1787, calling a convention to meet in Philadelphia the following May—> for the sole and express purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation and reporting to Congress and the several legislatures such alterations and provisions therein as shall when agreed to in Congress and confirmed by the States render the Federal Constitution adequate to the exigencies of Government and the preservation of the Union.

The difficulties this convention faced are indicated by George Washington's statement quoted by Gouverneur Morris:

> It is too probable that no plan we propose will be adopted. Perhaps another dreadful conflict is to be sustained. If to please the people, we offer what we ourselves disapprove, how can we afterward defend our work? Let us raise a standard to which the wise and honest can repair. The event is in the hand of God.

From May to September, the Convention struggled to devise a plan of Federal Government which the delegates were willing to defend, and when that task was completed, the work of obtaining approval for the new Constitution had hardly begun. Ratification by nine States was necessary before it could be adopted. The people of the States must be made to understand the virtues of the plan and the necessity for concessions which had been made in compromise provisions that did not completely satisfy anyone, even the members of the Constitutional Convention.

Gov. Edmund Randolph, of Virginia, who had presented to the Convention the Virginia plan which became the primary basis for the final document said it contained features so odious that he doubted whether he should ever be able to agree with it. Luther Martin, of Maryland, who had backed a proposal by Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina, to require a two-thirds vote of the Congress for passage of any act regulating commerce, left Philadelphia in disgust before the Convention adjourned, complaining of the threat to States rights which he saw in the proposed Constitution.

Virginia, which had the largest population of any of the original States, had taken the lead in proposing an improvement over the Articles of Confederation, but Virginia also was in a key position in the contest over ratification. James Madison, during the debate in the Virginia ratifying convention, frankly said that if Virginia held out, the United States might never have a government.

The point I want to make about the relation of the United States Senate and its rules of procedure to the controversy over ratification of the Federal Constitution may not be obvious, but I believe it will be clear to anyone who will review the debate in the State ratifying conventions or the published arguments of the Federalists and the anti-Federalists of that period.

Without attempting a complete review at this time, let me illustrate by specific references to the Virginia convention, which, as I have indicated, played a decisive role.

Addressing the Virginia convention on June 4, 1788, Patrick Henry, who had been recognized as the sparkplug of the revolution said:

> The public mind as well as my own is extremely uneasy at the proposed change of government. * * * I consider myself as the servant of the people of this Commonwealth, as a sentinel over their rights, liberty, and happiness. I represent their feelings when I say, that they are exceedingly uneasy, being brought from that State of full security which they enjoyed, to the present delusive appearance of things. * * * And here I would make this inquiry of those worthy characters who composed a part of the late Federal convention. I am sure they were fully impressed with the necessity of forming a great consolidated government instead of a confederation. That this is a consolidated government is demonstrably clear; and the danger of such a government is to my mind very striking.
> I have the highest veneration for those gentlemen; but, sir, give me leave to demand, what right had they to say we the people? * * * who authorized them to speak the language of, we the people, instead of we, the States? States are the characteristics, and the soul of a confederation. If the States be not the agents of this compact, it must be one great, consolidated, National Government of the people of all the States. I have the highest respect for those gentlemen who formed the convention. * * * The people gave them no power to use their name. That they exceeded their power is perfectly clear.

Henry continued by saying:

Here is a revolution as radical as that which separated us from Great Britain. It is as radical, if in this transition our rights and privileges are endangered, and the sovereignty of the States be relinquished; and cannot we plainly see that this is actually the case? The rights of conscience, trial by jury, liberty of the press, all your immunities and franchises, all pretensions to human rights and privileges are rendered insecure, if not lost, by this change. * * * You are not to inquire how your trade may be increased, nor how you are to become a great and powerful people, but how your liberties can be secured; for liberty ought to be the direct end of your Government.

Is it necessary for your liberty that you should abandon those great rights by the adoption of this system? Is the relinquishment of the trial by jury and the liberty of the press necessary for your liberty? Will the abandonment of your most sacred rights tend to the security of your liberty? Liberty, the greatest of earthly blessings—give us that precious jewel, and you may take everything else. * * * Guard with jealous attention the public liberty. Suspect everyone who approaches that jewel. Unfortunately nothing will preserve it but downright force: whenever you give up that force, you are inevitably ruined.

In that oratorical outburst, as Senators will recognize, Patrick Henry attributed to the proposed Federal Constitution the kind of all-embracing power which is claimed for it by your present-day Federalists, who insist that the Federal Government can go into local communities and supervise school systems, oversee voting, and exercise police powers. Therefore, it might be suggested that as a believer in States rights I have an adverse witness in Henry, who conceded points I will not admit. My point is, however, that if the Virginia convention of 1788 had accepted Henry's viewpoint, it would not have ratified the Constitution and there probably would not have been the kind of Union we have today.

Ratification occurred because the convention chose to accept the assurances of Washington and Madison and others who said, as I shall point out presently, that the rights of the States had been recognized by the framers of the Constitution but, to remove any possible doubt as to their intentions, a series of amendments could be adopted by the next Congress putting the implied bill of individual and States rights and the limitations on the Central Government in written form.

But, to continue for a moment with Henry's arguments: In addition to objecting to what he considered to be a consolidated government which changed fundamentally the relations the States had chosen to bear to each other, he said that the vast and alarming array of specific powers given to the General Government, and the wide door opened for an unlimited extension of those powers by the clause which authorized Congress "to pass all laws necessary to carry the given powers into effect," would enable Congress to do anything and everything it chose under the pretense of giving effect to some specified power.

Patrick Henry continued his argument by saying:

Congress by the power of taxation—by that of raising an army and navy—and by their control over the militia—have the sword in one hand and the purse in the other. Shall we be safe without either? Congress have an unlimited power over both; they are entirely given up by us. Let him [Mr. Madison] candidly tell me where and when did freedom exist, when the sword and purse were given up from the people? Unless a miracle in human affairs shall interpose, no nation ever did or ever can retain its liberty after the loss of the sword and the purse.

Henry argued that the right of trial by jury in civil cases would be lost because of the clause giving the Supreme Court appellate power over law and fact in every case, which would "enable that tribunal to annihilate both the verdict and judgment of inferior courts." He said that in criminal cases trial by jury was "worse than gone" because the common law which alone gave the challenge for favor would not be in force in the Federal courts, and juries could be packed to suit the purpose of the prosecutor.

He said also that Congress would be given the power "of involving the Southern States in all the horrors which would result from a total emancipation of their slaves," and that the Northern States, uninterested in the consequencies of such an act, and with a controlling majority possessing the power, probably would be inclined to do this.

Patrick Henry's prediction was fulfilled, of course, by Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation and the legislation of the reconstruction era, which brought to the Southern States the "horrors" he had feared. And today we are facing a threat of new horrors which may result from actions of a majority, which has power but is uninterested in the consequences of wrecking the educational systems of the Southern States.

Henry's objections were reinforced by George Mason, who said the power to levy direct taxes given to the Central Government was "calculated to annihilate totally the State governments," and it is obvious that some convincing reassurance must have been given to the Virginia convention, and to those in New York and other hesitant States, to induce the acts of ratification.

These reassurances included the endorsement of George Washington, who threw his great influence on the side of the Constitution and said the choice was between "adoption or anarchy." They included also the support of John Marshall, who said later in one of his opinions:

No political dreamer was ever wild enough to think of breaking down the lines which separate the States, and compounding the American people into one common mass.

But, probably the most influential factor in producing ratification was the expositions of the Constitution presented by James Madison and Alexander Hamilton in the Federalist papers. Virginians of his day accepted with confidence the statements of Madison that the States would continue to be recognized as sovereign units which had delegated only specific powers to the Central Government. They were reassured also by the fact that Hamilton, who was the leading champion of a strong Central Government, stated his agreement with Madison on that point.

In "The Federalist," No. 14, Madison wrote:

In the first place, it is to be remembered that the General Government is not to be charged with the whole power of making and administering laws. Its jurisdiction is limited to certain enumerated objects, which concern all the members of the Republic but which are not to be attained by the separate provisions of any. The subordinate governments, which can extend their care to all those other objects which can be separately provided for, will retain their due authority and activity. Were it proposed by the plan of the convention to abolish the governments of the particular States, its adversaries would have some ground for their objection; though it would not be difficult to show that if they were abolished the General Government would be compelled, by the principle of self-preservation, to reinstate them in their jurisdiction.

Hamilton, in turn, in "The Federalist," No. 17, referred to the fears that allowing the Federal Government to deal directly with individual citizens would make the Central Government too powerful and enable it to absorb the residuary powers of the States and localities. He said it was improbable that Federal authorities would have a disposition to do this because "the attempt to exercise those powers would be as troublesome as it would be nugatory."

In "The Federalist," No. 39, Madison went into more detail to explain the nature of the proposed Government as part nationalist and part Federal. He said that—

If the Government be national with regard to the operation of its powers, it changes its aspect again when we contemplate it in relation to the extent of its powers. * * * In this relation the proposed Government cannot be deemed a national one; since its jurisdiction extends to certain enumerated objects only, and leaves to the several States a residuary and inviolable sovereignty over all other objects.

In the next paper, "Federalist," No. 40, Madison argued that the constitutional convention had not exceeded its authority because it had adhered to the Confederation principle of a general government of limited powers. "We have seen," he said, "that in the new government, as in the old, the general powers are limited; and that the States, in all enumerated cases, are left to the enjoyment of their sovereign and independent jurisdiction."

Hammering on the same point in "Federalist," No. 44, Madison wrote:

As their constitutions invest the State legislatures with absolute sovereignty, in all cases not excepted by the existing Articles of Confederation, all the authorities contained in the proposed Constitution, so far as they exceed those enumerated in the Confederation would have been annulled and the new Congress would have been reduced to the same impotent conditions as their predecessors.

Because of this situation, he said it had been necessary to give the Central Government treatymaking powers without which it could not handle foreign affairs.

Continuing his exposition in "Federalist," No. 45, Madison said:

The powers delegated by the proposed Constitution to the Federal Government are few and defined. Those which are to remain in the State governments are numerous and indefinite. The former will be exercised principally on external objects, as war, peace, negotiation, and foreign commerce; with which last the power of taxation will, for the most part be connected. The powers reserved to the several States will extend to all the objects which, in the ordinary course of affairs, concern the lives, liberties, and properties of the people, and the internal order, improvement and prosperity of the State. The operations of the Federal Government will be most important and extensive in times of war and danger; those of the State governments in times of peace and security.

Hamilton's agreement with these views was recorded in "Federalist," No. 82, where he wrote that the principles established in a former paper in the series—teach us that the States will retain all preexisting authorities which may not be exclusively delegated to the Federal head; and that this exclusive delegation can only exist in one of three cases; where an exclusive authority is, in express terms, granted to the Union; or where a particular authority is granted to the Union, and the exercise of a like authority is prohibited to the States; or where an authority is granted to the Union, with which a similar authority in the States would be utterly incompatible.

Even in the light of these positive assurances of recognition of and respect for sovereign rights of the States, however, Massachusetts ratified the Constitution only under promise of amendments, Virginia with a demand for them and New York practically upon the condition of amendments. Virginia also made its position plain by naming as its first Senators, Richard H. Lee and William Grayson, who had been nominated by Patrick Henry, in preference to the nominees of James Madison.

The first Congress, which met in 1789, responded to the popular demand by proposing 12 amendments to the Constitution in a resolution which stated:

The conventions of a number of States having at the time of their adopting the Constitution expressed a desire, in order to prevent misconstruction or abuse of its powers, that further declaratory and restrictive clauses should be added: And as extending the ground of public confidence in the Government will best insure the beneficial ends of its institution, Resolved That the following articles be proposed as amendments.

These first amendments, 10 of which were adopted, included, as I need hardly remind Senators, the ninth, which says:

The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people—

And the 10th, which says—

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

There can be no question, therefore, as to the intention of the Founding Fathers to protect States rights but since, as Patrick Henry said, the Central Government was given the power of the sword and the purse, how could the preservation of those rights be insured?

The Chief Executive of the Nation is sworn to uphold the Constitution, but if he interprets his duties as permitting interference in fields reserved for State action, who shall check him? The courts, and especially the Supreme Court, are interpreters of the law, but when the highest Court conceives of itself as a policymaking body and issues orders involving social reforms which interfere with State functions, how can this trend be checked? The Congress, in addition to having the power to make laws, has the power to impeach the President and other officials, but what if the popularly elected Representatives yield to public clamor and endorse proposals which infringe on States rights?

It is when an answer to these questions is sought that the unique position of the Senate in our system of government becomes apparent. This body is the one place where the sovereign States are represented as such and on a basis of equality. Even though Senators, since adoption of the seventeenth amendment, are elected by the people instead of being chosen by State legislatures, they still are representatives of their States as a whole and are insulated from temporary waves of popular sentiment by 6-year terms and by having no more than a third of the Senate seats at issue in any one election year.

Madison said:

The use of the Senate is to consist in its proceeding with more coolness, with more system and with more wisdom than the popular branch.

As Senators will recall, Washington described the Senate to Jefferson as a saucer in which legislation was poured to cool.

That traditional function of the Senate can be exercised effectively only so long as this body remains a truly open forum in which each spokesman for a sovereign State can expound his views for as long as his conscience dictates when the rights of his State or the integrity of the Constitution which protects those rights are threatened. The Senate will become no more than a slower House of Representatitves in its net results if a simple majority can decide when discussion should be stopped and a vote taken.

It was Thomas Jefferson who told the Senate in its early days that the only weapons by which minorities can defend themselves from the abuses which the wantonness of power is but too often apt to suggest to large and successful majorities are the forms and rules of proceedings which we have adopted.

Woodrow Wilson, in his book on constitutional government said:

An attempt was once made to bring the previous question into the practices of the Senate, but it failed of success, and so that imperative form of cutting off all further discussion has fortunately never found a place there. * * * The Senate's opportunity for open and unrestricted discussion and its simple, comparatively, and unencumbered forms of proceeding unquestionably enable it to fulfill with very considerable success its high function as a chamber of revision.

Therefore, I say that before we tamper with a plan of proceeding which has been carried on with such distinguished approval for a century and a half, we should be very certain that there is justification for a change.

That brings me to my second main point, which is that a change in the existing rules is unnecessary.

We are told that a majority must be given the power to cut off debate after some specified period of time in order to break the power of the filibuster.

What, then, is the power of the filibuster and how has it been used to the detriment of the United States?

The history of limitation of debate in the Senate and of incidents which led to attempts to impose limitation has been set forth so effectively in the Library of Congress' "Public Affairs Bulletin," No. 64, by Dr. George Galloway and that study is so well known to Members of the Senate that I shall not repeat the details here. Senators will recall that the device of the previous question for ending debate, which was allowed in the Continental Congress as well as the British Parliament was carried over into the rules of the Senate in 1789 and allowed to stand until 1806 before it was abolished and truly free debate instituted. During that first 17 years the previous question was invoked only four times and used only three times, but that was enough to make its dangers evident and when Henry Clay sought to have the rule revived in 1841 he failed.

Numerous later attempts have been made, as they are being made now, to impose restrictions on debate, but it is notable that the general tendency has been for new Members of the Senate, impatient with what seems to be its deliberate pace, to want the rules changed and then for those same Members, as they gain more experience, to recognize the virtues of free debate and to defend the existing rule.

What we now know as rule XXII was adopted in 1917 under pressure of a war emergency and on recommendation of Woodrow Wilson who, as I have indicated by quoting him, fully recognized the importance of free debate under normal conditions. Wilson thought this radical step was needed to provide authority to arm ships but it later was determined that he had the authority without resort to legislation and the tampering with Senate rules was a useless gesture.

From our perspective, there is more reasonableness in Wilson's calm writing on Government than in his impassioned plea for quick Senate action on one occasion and in his book on "Constitutional Government" he said:

The informing function of Congress should be preferred even to its legislative function. The argument is not only that discussed and interrogated administration is the only pure and efficient administration, but more than that, that the only really self-governing people is that people which discusses and interrogates its administration. The talk on the part of Congress which we sometimes justly condemn is the profitless squabble of words over frivolous bills or selfish party issues. It would be hard to conceive of there being too much talk about the practical concerns and processes of government. Such talk it is which, when earnestly and purposefully conducted, clears the public mind and shapes the demands of public opinion.

The significant thing, in our consideration of whether there is need to change the Senate rules governing debate, is not whether there have been occasions when some time has been wasted by what Woodrow Wilson called "profitless squabble of words," but whether the ultimate effect of these incidents has been harmful.

The record, as set forth in the Library study to which I have referred, shows that many bills against which extended debate was directed ultimately were passed and I believe careful study would reveal that in most instances the legislation was improved by the cooling-off period.

In the entire history of the Senate only 11 bills have been completely blocked by filibusters. These include the Force bill of 1890, which would have provided for Federal supervision of elections; the armed ship resolution of 1917 which, as I have indicated, turned out not to be needed after we declared war on Germany, and nine so-called civil rights bills, all of which were unconstitutional in whole or in part.

Four poll tax bills would have interfered with the constitutionality granted right of the States to handle elections and invaded a field that can be legitimately reached only through a constitutional amendment. Three antilynching bills obviously infringed on the police powers of the States, entering the area which Hamilton said would be so troublesome he could not conceive of Federal officials attempting it. Two fair employment practices bills also would have dealt with private justice between citizens of the same State, an area in which Hamilton said the "transcendent advantage" belongs to the State governments.

Defeat of these few bills is the net cost of past filibusters. And what is the threat of future losses which makes a rules change at this time seem so urgent to some of its advocates? All they can mention are some more so-called civil rights bills which, under the guise of protecting specific rights claimed by certain minority pressure groups, actually threaten the broader rights of all the people to which Patrick Henry referred as the "precious jewel"—"public liberty."

These bills are not wanted by the great mass of the people of the country. If there were a genuine national demand for them, instead of merely a synthetic pressure to promote them, they could be passed under existing rules.

Debate can be ended now by a vote of two-thirds of the Members of the Senate. If a national emergency, such as that which Woodrow Wilson thought existed in 1917, should demand prompt action on some legislation, I am confident that more than two-thirds of the Members of this body would cooperate in silencing obstructionists. The necessary votes also would be obtainable to stop a filibuster even in peacetime against obstruction of any truly vital legislation.

I am proud of the fact, however, that my colleagues in the Senate have included enough believers in the principles of States rights and enough defenders of legitimate minority interests to prevent the gagging of anyone who has taken the time which he thought necessary to bring the viewpoint of his State to the attention of citizens of all the other States where questions of principle and of constitutionality were concerned, and I hope that attitude will continue to prevail on this floor.

Our present rule on limitation of debate is adequate and changing it is unnecessary.

My final point is that a radical change in the present rule would be dangerous and detrimental in the long run even to the interests which now advocate the change.

Newspaper writers and other commentators are inclined to describe those now advocating a change in our rules as liberals who have been frustrated in efforts to promote civil rights bills or social welfare measures and to associate defense of free debate with an ultraconservative viewpoint. The record shows, however, that free debate, including efforts which have been generally recognized as filibusters, often have been used and defended by liberal leaders.

A delay, during which the people of the country are made aware of the details of an issue, can be used, and has been used to help bring about reforms, as well as to block passage of oppressive measures.

There was, for example, the extended debate in 1863 against efforts to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. There was the filibuster against an Army appropriation bill in 1876 which carried a rider that would have suspended existing election laws. There was the successful filibuster in 1890 against the force bill, which would have provided for Federal supervision of elections.

Our distinguished former colleague, Senator George, of Georgia, testified during the 1947 hearings on proposals to limit Senate debate that if there had been such a limitation in 1937 it would have been impossible to rally enough support to block the effort of a powerful and popular President to pack the Supreme Court, and Members now in this body will recall that in 1946 the House passed in a matter of minutes a bill to draft striking railroad workers. That proposal, so violently objected to by organized labor, would have become law but for the opportunity of the Senate to analyze it in a deliberate manner.

In the 1957 Senate committee hearings a spokesman for the AFL–CIO said that powerful organization favored a change in rules to limit Senate debate primarily because of "the apparent need for more comprehensive Federal legislation in the field of civil rights." In 1925, however, when Vice President Dawes was trying to get the Senate to adopt a previous question rule he was denounced by the American Federation of Labor for trying to gag the Senate and threaten the rights of the people, and in 1946, as I have indicated, absence of such a gag rule may have been all that prevented striking railroad workers from being drafted into military service.

It was the great liberal leader, Senator La Follette, who fought the 1917 cloture rule, saying:

This Senate is the only place in our system where no matter what may be the organized power behind any measure to rush its consideration and to compel its adoption, there is a chance to be heard, where there is opportunity to speak at length, and where, if need be, under the Constitution of our country and the rules as they stand today, the constitutional right is reposed in a Member of this body to halt a Congress or a session on a piece of legislation which may undermine the liberties of the people and be in violation of the Constitution which Senators have sworn to support. When you take that power away from Members of this body, you let loose in a democracy forces that in the end will be heard elsewhere, if not here.

And it was William E. Borah, another liberal spokesman, who said in 1925 that he had never known a good measure to be killed by a filibuster or a debate but that he had known a vast number of bad measures and unrighteous measures which could not have been killed in any other way except through long discussion and debate.

One of the most eloquent defenses of free Senate debate was that delivered in 1918 by Senator Watson of Indiana, who said of the Underwood resolution to establish the previous question:

If this had been the rule of the U.S. Senate for the first 50 years of its existance John C. Calhoun would not have been able to thunder forth the doctrines in which he believed; Hayne could not have announced on the floor the ideas which he so eloquently espoused; Henry Clay would have been unable to deliver in full any one of the score of speeches that accomplished so much for his country; and Daniel Webster, imperious orator of American history, could not have blazed the pathway of the future in that historic utterance in which he announced the essential policies of the Republic if its institutions are to endure, for on the floor of the U.S. Senate and in the open forum of debate he in a sense shaped the destiny of the Republic and molded the future of the Nation.

It matters not, Mr. President, whether the minority at any particular time represents a basically liberal or a basically conservative viewpoint—the group which does not have a majority of votes needs some protection against unreasonable impositions and the U.S. Senate was designed to provide that protection.

The Christian Science Monitor, which I admire greatly for its sound handling of news although I do not always agree with its editorial positions, published an editorial on December 4, 1958, in which it frankly recognized the dangers of limiting debate.

This paper, which has endorsed civil rights legislation, said it was not persuaded that the plan to enable the Senate to act on any question by simple majority vote is wholly wise. The editorial said:

It might be well to note that the American system is not simply one of majority rule. It contains many provisions to hold up hasty majority action, which can have many of the aspects of mob action. * * * What are the reasons for these curbs on majority rule? One was the necessity of overcoming the fears of governmental oppression. States and minority groups were concerned lest they be overwhelmed by sheer numbers in the national system. A second was the awareness that successful operation of free government requires the consent—if not enthusiastic support—of the bulk of the people.

In practice such government may find the volume of majority opinion balanced by the intensity of minority feeling. We are seeing a pertinent illustration today in the struggle over desegregation.

The editorial continued by saying that the filibuster usually becomes an issue only in connection with some great national question and has been used by liberals as well as conservatives and added:

It has been used genuinely to insure that the Nation became fully informed on proposals before decision was made.

Another recent newspaper comment which I believe worthy of attention here was that of William S. White, author of a penetrating book on the Senate, who said in his syndicated column on November 20, 1958, that if the Senate rules on debate are changed this year—possible eventual losers may be all future minorities—economic, religious, racial or sectional—to the immediate gain of the currently mistreated minority, the Negroes.

Mr. White said:

A faction of advanced liberals is demanding an alteration so extreme that its adoption would end the Senate as a unique deliberative body.

And he added:

Many liberals forget that the filibuster weapon, deemed by them to be in unworthy hands, has many times halted vindictive legislation that a thoroughly democratic House was all too ready to approve.

In another of his columns this writer said:

The advanced liberals can fairly argue that the Senate ought to be a place of straight majority rule. But they cannot fairly argue that the Constitution has made it such. They intend to change the meaning of the constitutional structure; surely they ought to say so. And they cannot deny that there have been times when a simple-majority anti-filibuster rule could have imperiled all civil rights. In the twenties, for illustration, disinterested scholars estimated 26 States to be politically in the grip of the Ku Klux Klan. This could have meant not 50 but 52 votes to halt Senate debate—a majority no less. The ultimate victims of halting Senate debate by simple majority would be any or every minority interest or issue, given a favorable atmosphere for the majority.

I have been stressing the interest which liberals should take in the preservation of free Senate debate because those who claim to speak as liberal leaders have become the immediate advocates of a change. But the interests of those who call themselves conservatives, in the sense that they would preserve our great national heritage, also are deeply involved.

I was pleased to see recognition of this fact during the 1957 Senate committee hearings when the National Sons of the American Revolution put in the RECORD a resolution of unalterable opposition to any change which would substantialy alter the right of free discussion secured by Senate rule XXII. This resolution said:

Freedom of debate in the U.S. Senate performs the same essential function as freedom of the press under the first amendment, in keeping the people fully informed in respect to matters which may vitally affect their freedom and the security of constitutional rights.

I was pleased also that my fellow Virginian, Dan Daniel, as National Commander of the American Legion, authorized the Honorable John J. Wicker, Jr. to put him on record in those hearings as opposing any further limitation of Senate debate.

The love of liberty is not dead in our Nation, nor is there a lack of voices willing to speak in defense of those institutions on which our freedom was founded. But, to preserve a forum for those voices, we must respect the advice of Thomas Jefferson, who said in his "Manual of Parliamentary Procedure," on which our Senate rules are based:

As it is always in the power of the majority, by their numbers, to stop any improper measures proposed on the part of their opponents, the only weapons by which the minority can defend themselves against similar attempts from those in power are the forms and rules of proceeding which have been adopted as they were found necessary, from time to time, and are become the law of the House, by a strict adherence to which the weaker party can only be protected from those irregularities and abuses which these forms were intended to check and which the wantonness of power is but too often apt to suggest to large and successful majorities.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am unalterably opposed to any change in the present cloture rule of the Senate which would increase the power of the majority to put a gag on the minority.

It is my firm opinion that the rule by which two-thirds of the membership can limit debate is as restrictive of free discussion as it can be, at the present time, without seriously infringing on the right of the minority to be heard, the right of the States to equal representation, and the preservation of the Senate as a great and unique institution.

The Senate is the last forum on earth where men can discuss matters of vital importance without severe restrictions on debate. This circumstance is one reason, perhaps the major reason, why the Senate has become known as the world's greatest deliberative body and why the great English statesman, Gladstone, described the Senate as "that remarkable body, the most remarkable of all inventions of politics."

I willingly accept the fact, so frequently pointed out by those who would impose gag rule on the Senate, that the rules of this body are unusual. Indeed, the Senate is unique among parliamentary bodies. It is a great legislative body, and all the greater because it has not been constrained to bend to any popular notion of what rules a parliamentary body should follow.

The roots of the Senate rules are founded in history. At the time our Constitution was being framed, there was a great reluctance, on the part of the individual States, to surrender any of their cherished liberties to a Federal Government.

At that time, there were some unusual laws and customs in most of the individual States. The people within these States were wary of surrendering State sovereignty to a Federal Government which might arbitrarily and hastily nullify State laws. They had recently freed themselves from tyranny and secured for themselves individual liberty in a great fight for independence. Consequently, numerous safeguards to protect the rights of the States were built into the Constitution. Before they would assent to the ratification of this supreme law, however, they won assurance of early approval of the first 10 amendments to the Constitution. These amendments, commonly referred to as the Bill of Rights, constitutes the greatest set of civil and individual rights to be found anywhere.

One of the principal safeguards built into the original Constitution was the formation of a Senate in which every State was given equal representation. The Senate was envisioned, by the Founding Fathers, as a body where the rights of States, and the views of minorities, would be given unusual consideration. During the course of the debates of the Philadelphia Constitutional Convention of 1787, the delegates reached agreement upon a House of Representatives to be elected by the people every 2 years and based upon a population ratio divided into congressional districts. After this action was taken, the smaller of the participating 13 States wondered how their minorities could be adequately protected from the capricious whims of a majority in the House.

After long debate which was at times most acrimonious and which actually threatened to break up the Convention, the solution was offered by the wise and venerable Benjamin Franklin; namely, equal representation in the Senate for every State. And, to make sure that that representation would be of a character that would calmly consider and patriotically and unselfishly act on laws under which all the people would have to live, it was provided in the original instrument that Members of the Senate should be elected by State legislators and not by popular vote and given a term of 6 years.

The Founding Fathers also wrote into the original Constitution other safeguards against what the advocates of a rules change term "majority rule." They provided in certain instances for votes requiring a majority of two-thirds. Here are some of these provisions as found in the Constitution:

No person shall be convicted on impeachment without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present (art. I, sec. 3).

Each House, with the concurrence of two-thirds, may expel a Member (art. I, sec. 5).

A bill returned by the President with his objections may be repassed by each House by a vote of two-thirds (art. I, sec. 7).

The President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur (art. II, sec. 2).

Congress shall call a convention for proposing amendments to the Constitution on the application of two-thirds of the legislatures of the several States (art. V).

Congress shall propose amendments to the Constitution whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary (art. V).

When the choice of a President shall devolve upon the House of Representatives, a quorum shall consist of a Member or Members from two-thirds of the various States of the Union (amendment 12).

A quorum of the Senate, when choosing a Vice President, shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators (amendment 12).

The Constitution, therefore, does not give recognition, in all cases, to the right of the majority to control.

By analogy it requires a two-thirds vote of the Senate to expel one single Member.

Thus, we can see from a glance back into history how concerned our forefathers were for protecting the rights of individuals, minorities, and the States in drafting the fundamental principles of our Government. From the start, too, our forefathers recognized that these rights could only be secured if adequate protection was provided by established rules of procedure. They had the wisdom to realize that substantive rights contained in the supreme law might be later mutilated or trammeled if procedural safeguards were not provided to insure long and careful deliberation of the legislative issues which, if approved, might restrict the rights of the individuals, minorities, and the States.

Thus we find the great statesman and political philosopher, Thomas Jefferson, saying in the preface to his Manual, which he deposited with the Senate and which became the recognized guide for all our legislative bodies:

Mr. Onslow, the ablest among the Speakers of the House of Commons, used to say it was a maxim he had often heard when he was a young man, from old and experienced members, that nothing tended more to throw power into the hands of administration, and those who acted with the majority of the House of Commons, than a neglect of, or departure from, the rules of proceeding; that these forms, as instituted by our ancestors, operated as a check and control on the actions of the majority, and that they were, in many instances, a shelter and protection to the minority against the attempts of power. So far the maxim is certainly true, and is founded in good sense; that as it is always in the power of the majority, by their numbers, to stop any improper measure proposed on the part of their opponents, the only weapons by which the minority can defend themselves against similar attempts from those in power are the forms and rules of proceeding which have been adopted as they were found necessary, from time to time, and are become the law of the House, by a strict adherence to which the weaker party can only be protected from those irregularities and abuses which these forms were intended to check and which the wantonness of power is but too often apt to suggest to large and successful majorities.

And whether these forms be in all cases the most rational or not, is really not of so great importance. It is much more material that there should be a rule to go by, than what that rule is; that there may be a uniformity of proceeding in business not subject to the caprice of the Speaker or captiousness of the Members. It is very material that order, decency, and regularity be preserved in a dignified public body.

On a subsequent occasion, Mr. Jefferson had this to say concerning the protection of minority interests:

Bear in mind this sacred principle, that though the will of the majority is in all cases to prevail, that will to be rightful, must be reasonable; that the minority possess their equal rights, which equal laws must protect, and to violate would be oppression.

In accordance with the advice of Jefferson, the rules of the Senate were framed to provide for a check on the tyranny of the majority. The tradition has been preserved to the present day, although the rules of the Senate have been altered on some few occasions.

Throughout the history of our country, majorities have assailed the rules of the Senate, because the rules of the Senate act as a brake on the will of the majority, especially a radical majority.

I shall not assign base motives to the various majorities who, down through the years, have attempted to change the rules of the Senate. Fortunately for the United States, there have been relatively few cases in which a group of Senators, pressing for legislation, was not motivated by a sincere desire to benefit the country. We can take it as a general rule that the majority always thinks it is right.

Believing themselves to be right, the majority side, in any issue, is naturally vexed and even angry when it finds its will frustrated by a minority. It resents seeing a group which it believes to be in the wrong obstructing and delaying the enactment of legislation it believes to be useful.

This is a frustration which can cause a great mind to go astray and fall into error.

I think of Woodrow Wilson, for example. Wilson was one of the great students of our Government long before his election to the Presidency. Writing in 1881, in his "Congressional Government," he observed that "the Senate's opportunities for open and unrestricted discussion, and its simple, comparatively unencumbered forms of procedure, unquestionably enable it to fulfill with every considerable success its high functions as a chamber of revision."

In further expressing his views on free debate in the Senate, Mr. Wilson made this statement:

It is the proper duty of a representative body to look diligently into every affair of government and to talk much about what it sees. It is meant to be the eyes and the voice, and to embody the wisdom and will of its constituents. Unless Congress have and use every means of acquainting itself with the acts and the disposition of the administrative agents of the Government, the country must be helpless to learn how it is being served; and unless Congress both scrutinize these things and sift them by every form of discussion the country must remain in embarrassing, crippling ignorance of the very affairs which it is most important that it should understand and direct.

The informing function of Congress should be preferred even to its legislative function. The argument is not only that discussed and interrogated administration is the only pure and efficient administration, but more than that, that the only really self-governing people is that people which discusses and interrogates its administration. The talk on the part of Congress which we sometimes justly condemn is the profitless squabble of words over frivolous bills or selfish party issues. It would be hard to conceive of there being too much talk about the practical concerns and processes of government. Such talk it is which, when earnestly and purposefully conducted, clears the public mind and shapes the demands of public opinion.

Long afterward, a minority of the Senate killed President Wilson's armed neutrality ship bill. We all remember, I am sure, his classic excoriation of the Senate:

The Senate of the United States is the only legislative body in the world which cannot act when the majority is ready for action. A little group of willful men, representing no opinion but their own, have rendered the great Government of the United States helpless and contemptible.

This is one example, a classic one. There have been many cases of Senators who have argued for greater restrictions on debate while pressing for a majority point of view, who changed their opinions when the heat of debate had cooled.

This point was deeply impressed on my mind when I recently made a thorough study of the issue of free debate in the Senate. I am sure that many others have come to this same conclusion after their research efforts on this subject. The distinguished senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], one of the Senate's most able parliamentary experts of all time, made a very similar observation when testifying before the Senate Rules Committee in 1952. Here is what he had to say:

I have studied this question of the proposal to institute a more restrictive gag rule in the Senate. I once spent a couple of weeks in going back over the various occasions in the history of the Senate when these motions, these efforts, have been made to change the rules. I was interested to note two things: That almost always those who sought to change the rules to gag his adversary of the minority when he was in power became a great advocate of freedom of debate when he was translated from the majority to the minority. Further, almost invariably men who came to the Senate determined to change the rules of the Senate, if they stayed there long enough, came to defend the rules.

Perhaps the best so-called proof of the pudding on this point lies in a statement made by a former President of the United States while serving as a Member of this distinguished body during the period of 1915–20. Listen to these words of the late Warren G. Harding:

I have been hearing about the reformation of the Senate since I first entered politics; and it was rather an ironical thing the other day that one of the most emphatic speeches made in favor of the adoption of this rule was uttered by the very latest arrival in this body.

But the reformation of the Senate has long been a fad. I came here myself under the impression that there ought to be cloture and limitations on debate; and the longer I sit in this body, the more convinced do I become that the freedom of debate in the United States Senate is one of the highest guarantees we have of our American institutions.

Mr. President, before I take my seat I wish to say that the length of a speech is not the measure of its merit.

While the Senate may not listen, because the Senate does not listen very attentively to anybody, I discover, though Congress may not be apparently concerned and though the galleries of this body may not be filled to add their inspiring attention, I charge you now, Mr. President, that the people of the United States of America will be listening. This is the one central point, the one open forum, the one place in America where there is freedom of debate, which is essential to an enlightened and dependable public sentiment, the guide of the American Republic.

More than a half century ago Senator Hoar of Massachusetts made this point on how experience can change minds:

There was a time in my legislative career when I believed that the absence of a cloture in the Senate was criminal neglect, and that we should adopt a system of rules by which business could be conducted; but the logic of my long service has now convinced me that I was wrong in that contention. There is a virtue in unlimited debate, the philosophy of which cannot be detected upon a surface consideration.

I believe that I understand the desire of some of my colleagues to change the rules of the Senate. They are anxious to rush into law certain proposals which they believe to be right and for which they believe they can count a majority of the Senate.

Let us suppose, for the sake of argument, that the majority has been right on every occasion during the deliberations of the 85th Congress. I do not believe this for a moment, but let us suppose it. If we accept this supposition, it follows that the work of the Senate would have proceeded more quickly, and more legislation would have been passed, if debate had been severely restricted. However, those who believe that the majority has always been right during the 85th Congress would hardly have the temerity to predict that the majority will always be right in the 86th Congress, or in the 186th.

There inevitably come times when the majority is dead wrong, and these are times when the will of the majority, if unchecked, can destroy our American Government. Some of the best examples of majority mistakes and wrongs were best summed up by former Senator James A. Reed, of Missouri, during the 1917 debate over rule XXII with these words:

Majority rule! Where is the logic or the reason to be found back of majority rule except in the mere necessity to dispatch business? The fact that a majority of 1 or 10 vote for a bill in the Senate is not a certification that the action is right. The majority has been wrong oftener than it has been right in all the course of time. The majority crucified Jesus Christ. The majority burned the Christians at the stake. The majority drove the Jews into exile and the ghetto. The majority established slavery. The majority set up innumerable gibbets. The majority chained to stakes and surrounded with circles of flame martyrs through all the ages of the world's history.

Majority rule without any limitation or curb upon the particular set of fools who happen to be placed for the moment in charge of the machinery of a government! The majority grinned and jeered when Columbus said the world was round. The majority threw him into a dungeon for having discovered a new world. The majority said that Galileo must recant or that Galileo must go to prison. The majority cut off the ears of John Pym because he dared advocate the liberty of the press.

Mr. President, in connection with this vitally important question of the preservation of rule XXII, I should like to quote briefly some comments made by two of the most outspoken opponents of the present rule.

In the course of an address delivered on March 29, 1957, at Ohio State University, the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] made this statement, referring to the adoption of the present rule:

What, in effect, has been done is to adopt John C. Calhoun's theory of concurrent majorities, under which a majority in the country or in Congress is not permitted to pass legislation unless it also meets with the approval of the majority of each and every section of the country. The failure of Calhoun and the South to establish this principle prior to 1860 was one of the factors which led to the Civil War. Its quiet adoption in modern times may well lead us to reconsider just who in the long run won that war.

In the same vein, the senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] in his statement appearing in the report of the Committee on Rules and Administration, dated April 30, 1958, declared as follows, again referring to the principle embodied in rule XXII:

This kind of balance, which the opponents of civil rights legislation wish to retain in the Senate, is a modern version of Calhoun's "concurrent majorities." It was such a sectional right of veto and interposition that Calhoun and other States rights advocates urged during the debates, in and out of Congress, that led up to the Civil War. This type of imbalance, however, finds no support in the Constitution nor in current practice outside of rule XXII.

Both of these distinguished Senators imply very strongly that the principle of the concurrent majority is a bad thing, an undesirable thing, something which all good Americans should abhor. This basic and general objection on their parts, I shall discuss in a few moments. First, however, I wish to address myself to the further statement made by the Senator from New York, to the effect that the doctrine of the concurrent majority is a repudiated and rejected theory which does not even exist in our system outside of rule XXII—if I may again quote the Senator's words, for emphasis, "This type of imbalance, however, finds no support in the Constitution nor in current practice outside of rule XXII."

The Senator is very badly mistaken. How he can have been on the American political scene as long as he has and still make that statement, is beyond my comprehension. As a matter of fact, the principle of the concurrent majority—a principle, by the way, which was not invented by Calhoun, but rather was enunciated by him—is the very foundation and basis of the American political system. True, the specific factor involved in rule XXII is a very important aspect of the concurrent majority principle; but to say that concurrent majority does not exist in actual practice outside of rule XXII is to be blind to the entire political mechanism of our country.

A number of years ago there appeared in Harper's magazine—issue of November 1948—a most interesting and informative article by the very able and very liberal writer, Mr. John Fischer, who has since become editor of the magazine. This article, which is entitled "Unwritten Rules of American Politics," bears so directly on the issue before us today, and the author has set down his thoughts so ably and so clearly that I should like to quote several passages from this article at some length if I may.

In contrast to the two distinguished Senators, who apparently regard Calhoun's theories as suspect or sinister or, it would appear, downright un-American, Mr. Fischer, liberal though he is, subscribes wholeheartedly to the view—expressed previously by Dr. Peter F. Drucker, of Bennington College—that Calhoun's ideas are "a major, if not the only, key to the understanding of what is specifically and uniquely American in our political system."

Mr. Fischer writes as follows:

Calhoun summed up his political thought in what he called the doctrine of the concurrent majority. He saw the United States as a Nation of tremendous and frightening diversity—a collection of many different climates, races, cultures, religions, and economic patterns. He saw the constant tension among all these special interests, and he realized that the central problem of American politics was to find some way of holding these conflicting groups together.

It could not be done by force; no one group was strong enough to impose its will on all the others. The goal could be achieved only by compromise—and no real compromise could be possible if any threat of coercion lurked behind the door. Therefore, Calhoun reasoned, every vital decision in American life would have to be adopted by a "concurrent majority"—by which he meant, in effect, a unanimous agreement of all interested parties. No decision which affected the slaveholders, he argued, should be taken without their consent; and by implication he would have given a similar veto to every other special interest, whether it be labor, management, the Catholic church, old-age pensioners, the silver miners, or the corngrowers of the Middle West.

Now at this point, Mr. President, Mr. Fischer ventures his opinion that, "under the goad of the slavery issue, Calhoun was driven to state his doctrine in an extreme and unworkable form"; but he makes it clear that this fact does not detract from the basic soundness of the doctrine itself. Mr. Fischer goes on to explain the concurrent majority doctrine, as follows:

Government by concurrent majority can exist only when no one power is strong enough to dominate completely, and then only when all of the contending interest groups recognize and abide by certain rules of the game.

These rules are the fundamental bond of unity in American political life. They can be summed up as a habit of extraordinary toleration, plus equality in the peculiar American meaning of that term which cannot be translated into any other language, even into the English of Great Britain. Under these rules every group tacitly binds itself to tolerate the interests and opinions of every other group. It must not try to impose its views on others, nor can it press its own special interests to the point where they seriously endanger the interests of other groups or of the Nation as a whole.

Furthermore, each group must exercise its implied veto with responsibility and discretion; and in times of great emergency it must forsake its veto right altogether. It dare not be intransigent or doctrinaire. It must make every conceivable effort to compromise, relying on its veto only as a last resort. For if any player wields this weapon recklessly, the game will break up—or all the other players will turn on him in anger, suspend the rules for the time being, and maul those very interests he is trying so desperately to protect. * * *

This is the somewhat elusive sense, it seems to me, in which Calhoun's theory has been adopted by the American people. But elusive and subtle as it may be, it remains the basic rule of the game of politics in this country.

Mr. President, I do not wish to labor the point, but I do want to make sure that the Senator from New York realizes that he was very seriously mistaken—and I want all the Members of this body to realize that he was mistaken—when he said that the concurrent majority system "finds no support * * * in current practice outside of rule XXII." Therefore, I shall, for the benefit of all the Senators, read several additional passages from Mr. Fischer's brilliant article. As Mr. Fischer points out:

The way in which this tradition (the concurrent majority rule) works in practice can be observed most easily in Congress. Anyone who has ever tried to push through a piece of legislation quickly discovers that the basic units of organization on Capitol Hill are not the parties, but the so-called blocs, which are familiar to everyone who reads a newspaper. There are dozens of them—the farm bloc, the silver bloc, the friends of labor, the business group, * * * the public power bloc—and they all cut across party lines.

They are loosely organized and pretty blurred at the edges, so that every Congressman belongs at different times to several different blocs. Each of them represents a special interest group. Each of them ordinarily works hand in hand with that group's Washington lobby. In passing, it might be noted that these lobbies are by no means the cancerous growth which is sometimes pictured in civics textbooks. They have become an indispensable part of the political machine, the accepted channel through which American citizens make their wishes known and play their day-to-day role in the process of government.

Now it is an unwritten but firm rule of Congress that no important bloc shall ever be voted down, under normal circumstances, on any matter which touches its own vital interests. Each of them, in other words, has a tacit right of veto on legislation in which it is primarily concerned. The ultimate expression of this right is the institution, uniquely American, of the filibuster in the Senate.

Before I continue with Mr. Fischer's remarks, Mr. President, let me point out that Mr. Fischer is a supporter of so-called civil-rights legislation; this is clear from his use of the word "ruthlessly" in his next sentence, which I shall read to you. But this very fact renders all the more impressive what he has to say in regard to the rule permitting free debate, which is as follows:

Recently it has acquired a bad name among liberals because the southern conservatives have used it ruthlessly to fight off civil-rights legislation * * *. Not so long ago, however, the filibuster was the stoutest weapon of such men as Norris and the La Follettes in defending many a progressive cause, and * * * liberal Senators may well have cause to use it again.

But it is not only in the Congress, Mr. President, that the doctrine of concurrent majority holds sway. Let me quote further from Mr. Fischer's article:

Calhoun's principles of the concurrent majority and of sectional compromise operate just as powerfully, though sometimes less obviously, in every other American political institution. Our Cabinet, for example, is the only one in the world where the members are charged by law with the representation of special interests—labor, agriculture, commerce, and so on. In other countries, each agency of government is at least presumed to act for the nation as a whole; here most agencies are expected to behave as servants for one interest or another. The Veterans' Administration, to cite the most familiar case, is frankly intended to look out for our boys; the Maritime Commission is the spokesman for the shipping industry; the National Labor Relations Board, as originally established under the Wagner Act, was explicitly intended to build up the bargaining power of the unions.

* * * * *

Calhoun's laws also govern the selection of virtually every candidate for public office. The mystery of eligibility which has eluded most foreign observers simply means that a candidate must not be unacceptable to any important special-interest group—a negative rather than a positive qualification. A notorious case of this process at work was the selection of Mr. Truman as the Democrat's vice-presidential candidate in 1944. As Edward J. Flynn, the boss of the Bronx, has pointed out in his memoirs, Truman was the one man "who would hurt * * * least" as Roosevelt's running mate. Many stronger men were disqualified, Flynn explained, by the tacit veto of one sectional interest or another. Wallace was unacceptable to the businessmen and to many local party machines. Byrnes was distasteful to the Catholics, the Negroes, and organized labor. RAYBURN came from the wrong part of the country. Truman, however, came from a border State, his labor record was good, he had not antagonized the conservatives, and—as Flynn put it—"he had never made any 'radical' remarks. He just dropped into the slot."

The same kind of considerations govern the selection of candidates right down to the county, city, and precinct levels. Flynn, one of the most successful political operators of our time, explained in some detail the complicated job of making up a ticket in his own domain. Each of the main population groups in the Bronx—Italians, Jews, and Irish Catholics—must be properly represented on the list of nominees, and so must each of the main geographical divisions. The result is a ticket which sounds like the roster of the Brooklyn Dodgers: Loreto, Delagi, Lyman, Joseph, Lyons, and Foley.

Comparable traditions govern the internal political life of the American Legion, the Federation of Women's Clubs, university student bodies, labor unions, Rotary Clubs, and the thousands of other quasi-political institutions which are so characteristic of our society and which give us such a rich fabric of spontaneous local government.

As I said at the outset, the first step I was undertaking in this address was to show beyond any peradventure of a doubt that the Senator from New York was in error—utterly and completely in error—when he said that Calhoun's doctrine "finds no support in current practice outside of rule XXII." I believe that the passages which I have read from Mr. Fischer's article have served to prove my point, more than satisfactorily; and I am sure that the Senator will, upon fair consideration, admit that he was indeed in error.

So now that we have established the point that the doctrine of concurrent majorities, of which the rule permitting unlimited debate is a very vital part, is in actuality the very foundation-stone of our entire political system here in America—now we can turn to the question of whether it is desirable, or undesirable, that we continue that system.

Certainly I would not argue—I hope no one in the South would argue—that we ought to continue to follow any particular system or doctrine simply because it was enunciated and developed by a great southerner, Calhoun. Nor do I think that anyone would say that the fact that the concurrent majority doctrine is, and always has been, the basic doctrine of American politics is, in and of itself, sufficient reason not to scrap that doctrine if it can be successfully attacked on its merits.

So let us do just that, Mr. President, let us go to the merits of the case. Let us look at rule XXII, not only from the standpoint of its guarantee of the most thorough and searching debate of every minute—but often vital—detail of a proposed piece of legislation. Let us, for the moment, look at rule XXII in its vital role as a key mechanism of the concurrent majority system—as a sort of minority veto, if you will. And let us be quite frank to state that that is just what rule XXII actually is—for, in addition to guaranteeing full and complete exploration of the issues, rule XXII does, or may, fulfill the function of a sort of minority veto—at least a partial one—against hostile legislation passed by the majority.

I do not think that anyone can contend now, Mr. President, that we are not meeting the issue fairly and squarely. And, thus meeting it, I contend, Mr. President, that the principle embodied in rule XXII far from being harmful or undesirable, is on the contrary valuable, beneficial, indeed indispensable, to the national welfare; because, as a vital part of the concurrent majority system, it is the surest protection of the rights of minorities against the tyranny of numerical majorities.

That, Mr. President, is the primary reason why we must steadfastly oppose any weakening of the principle embodied in rule XXII—on that principle depends the protection of minority rights in this country.

At this point, let me make it clear, Mr. President, that when I speak of "minorities," I use the term in its broad and general and universal sense—as employed by Calhoun and by Mr. Fischer—as applying to any type of minority group, whether it be sectional, ethnic, economic, religious, or otherwise; and not in the narrow and restricted meaning of the term, given it in recent years by those who would appropriate it to the exclusive use of certain racial and ethnic groups, the members of which are, to a large extent, located in politically strategic metropolitan areas of the North.

Bearing always in mind, then, Mr. President, this broad and true concept of the term "minority," I contend that rule XXII is in the long run a valuable, probably the most valuable, protection possessed by minority groups in this country. For minorities, of whatever kind, rule XXII is a shield against tyrannical legislation by the majority. It is, let me emphasize, a shield—never a sword, but only a shield; for it is a negative and not a positive power. It is a power by which the minority can, at the most, only prevent—and, usually, only modify—hostile legislation by the majority—it does not enable the minority to impose harmful legislation on the majority. It is a purely defensive weapon; and it is, I repeat, an indispensable one, if minorities in our society are to have any meaningful protection.

And why should not a minority be entitled to protection, where its own vital interest is concerned, against seriously harmful legislative action by a majority whose interests are not directly or vitally involved? I believe that such a minority should have such protection; I believe that such a minority is entitled to a defensive veto.

Evidently, the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois does not believe that a minority should be thus entitled to protection; either that, or he does not accord the great sectional minority known as the South the official status of being a "minority" at all—he being one of those, perhaps, whom I mentioned earlier as reserving the sacred term "minority" for the exclusive use of certain racial and religious groups which have a potent voting cencentration in certain key urban areas of the North—such as for instance, Cook County, Ill.

Mr. President, I hesitate to venture at this point into the area of civil rights, an area so emotionally charged, an area so complex—an area in which there are wheels within wheels, and problems within problems. But I know that members of the opposition will bring it up anyway—in fact, many of them are frank to state their primary reason for seeking to emasculate rule XXII is to facilitate the passage of more and more so-called civil rights legislation—and so I may as well go ahead and use this explosive field as my first example.

Mr. President, in the same address from which I quoted earlier today, the Senator from Illinois had this to say in regard to the use of the filibuster to block legislation:

> In practice it is probably limited . . . to those questions which a majority of the country as a whole favors, but which the voters of a large section bitterly oppose. . . . Civil rights legislation furnishes such an issue. The articulate sentiment of the South is vigorously opposed. And while public opinion in the North and West is on the whole favorable, it is in the main only tepidly so.

The Senator has put his finger right on it. Here is an issue, in which the minority section—the South—its own deepest interests being vitally concerned, is, as he puts it, "vigorously opposed" to the legislation, and in which the majority section—the North and West, that is, the United States outside the South—is, while on the whole favorable, only tepidly favorable—the reason for this tepidness being, of course, that in most areas of the majority section the problem is viewed only from the standpoint of theory and not that of practical conditions.

Now admittedly, this civil rights question is in some respects a somewhat atypical situation, in that, in addition to the usual elements of the tepid, not directly affected majority—the North and West as a whole—and the vitally concerned and immediately affected major minority—the South, we have in this case also another, smaller, minority, namely, the artifically, emotionally—let us simply say, politically—stimulated, and politically potent, minority known as the northern Negro. That is what I meant when I spoke of this problem as a complex one, having wheels within wheels. But the fact still remains that, speaking of the northern population as a whole, we have in this situation a majority not directly concerned and so only tepidly in favor, and on the other hand a minority—the South—which, since its vital interest—its most vital domestic interest—is directly and immediately at stake, is passionately opposed.

I say, Mr. President, that in such a situation, the minority is entitled to a form of partial veto by which it can prevent or at least modify extreme legislation—a protection which is now afforded by rule XXII. Here we have a large and important minority section of the country, the South, faced with legislation which would seriously and adversely affect it in its most vital domestic interest—by all means, that minority is entitled, under all the rules of our system as set forth so ably by Mr. Fischer, to the protection which rule XXII affords.

But let us turn from civil rights to another field, a field where the issues can be viewed more dispassionately than they possibly could, at the present time and in the present atmosphere, in any field involving questions of race. Let us leave the South and turn to the West.

Throughout far the greater part of this huge region, which comprises more than half of the Nation's area—all or part of 17 very large States—arid or semiarid climatic conditions prevail. The fact that rainfall is light and that water is therefore in short supply is perhaps the foremost fact that must be kept in mind in any consideration of the West. The historian Walter Prescott Webb has gone so far as to say that "the overriding influence that shapes the West is the desert."

I do not imagine that that is an overstatement. If it can be said that the cardinal problem of the South has been the problem of the Negro, it can also be said, perhaps even more truly, that the great problem of the West, throughout its history, has been the problem of water—or, rather, the lack of it.

Now I realize that, especially with the increasing industrial uses of water, the question of insufficient water supply is becoming a national problem, in a sense. But in a sense only, and never in the western sense. Nowhere in the humid East or South is water the problem, or even the kind of problem, that it is, and always has been, throughout the arid and semiarid West. To be sure, we in the Southeastern States have known periods of droughts, sometimes severe ones, and I am sure that the same has been true of New England and the Central States; but the farmers of our green and fertile and well-watered eastern half of the country have never known the life-or-death importance of water with quite the degree of immediacy and intimacy that has been the lot of the western farmer or rancher.

A drought such as those we occasionally have in the South can cause great harm to individual farmers and sometimes can even adversely affect the economies of considerable areas; but, comparatively speaking, the effect is generally only temporary, due to the blessed fact of our abundant average annual rainfall. But in the West, droughts have virtually depopulated whole sections of States and caused vast migrations of stricken farm families; and the scarcity of water, to begin with, has stifled the development, and in some cases completely prevented the settlement, of tremendous areas of the West. Small wonder then, that the problem of water looms so large in the western mind! No wonder at all that the question of control, development, and distribution of what water supplies do exist is, and long has been, a burning political, economic and social issue throughout the Western States—the West's most vital domestic concern.

Now, Mr. President, let us suppose that we are faced with a legislative proposal concerning water policy, one that would effect major and far-reaching changes in present water policy. It might be a bill which would have the effect of nullifying State water rights and vesting total control of water supplies in western areas in the Federal Government; it might deal with irrigation and reclamation projects; or it might be a bill dealing with watershed control which would forbid State or Federal public power projects or which would have the effect of handing over control of western water resources to utility holding companies. For the purposes of this argument, however, the exact proposal embodied in the bill does not matter. Let us simply say that it is a broad and far-reaching bill dealing with water policy.

Let us further assume, Mr. President, that public sentiment in the eastern half of the country is, in the main, favorable to the legislation. Only tepidly so, to be sure, to follow the wording of the Senator from Illinois—tepidly, because, their part of the country not being directly affected one way or the other, they really do not care very much about the issue. But still, on the basis of some editorials they have read in their newspapers, or some articles in picture magazines, and since, superficially at least, the announced purposes of the bill seem to be pretty much in accord with their political philosophies; since, in short, the proposal looks like a pretty fair deal which might bolster the national economy—at least its proponents say so—they are in favor of it rather than opposed to it.

To make the situation a little more complex politically, and also to keep it somewhat analogous to the civil rights situation, let us add to this tepid majority of the national public a very untepid group of utility companies, headquartered in the East but with interests in the West, and their financier allies—the real proponents of this bill, who stand to gain incredibly enormous profits if it becomes law. This element having considerable political power and, as already stated, the majority of the public at large being in favor of the proposal, albeit tepidly so, a majority of Senators are lined up in favor of the bill.

But let us say, Mr. President, that the people of the Western States, are passionately and almost unanimously opposed to the bill, because they are convinced that its passage will seriously and adversely affect their most vital interests. Conceivably the bill could be fatally destructive of the entire economic and social structure of most of the West.

Now if this were the situation, under the present rules, Mr. President, you know what would happen to that bill. It would never get through the Senate; in fact, it would probably never even be seriously proposed, at least without substantial modification, for the prospect of a determined filibuster by 20 or 30 western Senators would, as the Senator from New York expressed it, "make the majority come to terms."

But take away rule XXII, that shield and buckler of minorities, and this or any other outrage could be imposed on the West or any other minority element in our country. My distinguished colleagues from New York and Illinois, and their allies, would have it so. They would give to a simple majority of this body virtually absolute power over minorities. Apparently, Mr. President, they worship King Numbers. I want to make it clear that, like John Randolph of Roanoke, I do not. And I want to say, Mr. President, that it will be a sad day for minorities in this country of ours when the Members of this body, in derogation of their long followed tradition of concurrent majority, shall scrap the benign and moderating influence of rule XXII and substitute instead the rule of King Numbers—the most tyrannical ruler that ever lived.

Mr. President, minority groups are not the only beneficiaries of rule XXII. The greatest beneficiary of rule XXII is the country as a whole. The emasculation of rule XXII would be a blow to minorities, but it would be also a tragedy to the whole country. For rule XXII—the mere existence of the rule—accomplishes two very great things for the country: First, by discouraging extreme legislation in any direction, and preventing violent swings from left to right, it promotes stability in Government. Second, by giving minorities a defensive shield againts tyranny, it discourages the arising of tensions and situations which could, and probably would, lead to various and frequent forms of civil strife, perhaps actual civil war.

By way of explaining what some may at first thought deem rather extravagant claims in behalf of rule XXII, let me read a paragraph from the previously mentioned individual views of the senior Senator from the State of New York. He says:

> The ability to carry on a filibuster can affect the kind of legislation passed by the Senate even though no actual filibuster is undertaken. The incidence of a filibuster or the certain knowledge that a filibuster would be organized has made the majority come to terms before. The mere threat that a filibuster of great length would be undertaken against some proposal or unless amendment to a bill was accepted has, in effect, resulted in the majority of the Senate acquiescing in changes in legislation.

The distinguished Senator is quite correct in his statement—I agree with his analysis completely. The state of facts is just as he has put it. That is the way it is. Furthermore—and this is where the Senator and I part company, unfortunately—I maintain that it is right and good and fortunate for the country that that is the way it is; and I hope and pray that that is the way it will continue to be.

For if the rule should be changed, as the Senator would have it changed, so that legislative power would be absolute in a bare majority of the Members of this body, our country would lose its political stability. Our society, instead of continuing to follow a generally middle-of-the-road course, would soon be characterized by violent swings from right to left, from conservative to radical and then back to ultraconservative, from aggrandizement of a given interest group to extreme oppression of that interest group. I submit, Mr. President, that our country would be much the poorer for all this.

As matters stand now, due to the mere existence of rule XXII, the mere overhanging threat of a filibuster by any minority whose vital interest would be seriously threatened by a proposed piece of legislation, exerts a healthy moderating influence against extremes in any direction, against unconscionable oppression of any minority interest.

Mark now, let me again emphasize, this by no means constitutes what the opposition would have it, "minority rule"—it is only a defensive power in the minority to prevent extreme tyranny by the majority. And, as Mr. Fischer pointed out, this veto is not used recklessly or with abandon; it is not something to be wielded lightly, but only when confronted by the most extreme peril; its use is reserved for only those issues deemed the very most vital to the well-being of the minority in question. The reason for this is, of course, two-fold: First, it is neither an easy nor a pleasant exercise to conduct a filibuster. Second, the minority which today is making use of the negative power of the filibuster in order to block legislation must always remember that tomorrow it will be needing legislative allies from among various other blocs in order to pass some desired piece of positive legislation. As. Mr. Fischer expresses it:

> The farm bloc, for instance, normally needs no outside aid to halt the passage of a hostile bill. As a last resort, three or four strong-lunged statesmen from the Corn Belt can always filibuster it to death in the Senate. If the bloc wants to put through a measure to support agricultural prices, however, it can succeed only by enlisting the help of other powerful special interest groups. Consequently, it must always be careful not to antagonize any potential ally by a reckless use of the veto.

But I have digressed somewhat. As I was saying, rule XXII as it now stands, providing as it does the ever-present threat of a filibuster by any minority which would be critically threatened, exerts a healthy and moderating influence on legislation. Take away that rule and the inherent protection for minorities which it provides, and a bare majority of Senators could, and would, ram through whatever legislation they might choose, no matter how extreme, how punitive, or how fatal to the interests of any segment of our society.

Given a sharp split on some clear-cut major issue, in one year a bill which goes to extremes in one direction would be passed; a slight shift in Senate membership in a succeeding session could result in a violent swing in the opposite direction. One year, in which the radical forces were in a slight majority in the Senate and also had the Presidency, a labor-relations code that was strongly prolabor and antimanagement could become law; a very slight shift in popular sentiment could result the next year—say it was a presidential year—in a conservative President, and in a Senate in which conservatives, instead of radicals, held a bare majority, and in place of the bill that was prolabor, a union-crippling, flagrantly promanagement bill would be passed. One Congress would nationalize the railroads, or the steel industry, the next would denationalize them; and so on and on, issue upon issue, ad infinitum. How long, Mr. President, could our Government, our economy and our society survive such intolerable instability?

But the moderating influence which rule XXII exerts on legislation does more than merely promote order and stability in our Government and in our society; it is not too much to say that rule XXII insures the very survival of that Government and that society. For, by preventing extreme oppression of sectional or other minorities in this country, it discourages the arising of those tensions and resentments and feelings of injustice and frustration which otherwise would explode in civil war. We would do well to remember that on one of the very few major occasions in our history that the rules of the game were suspended and an important minority was completely overridden by the majority—namely, when the South was overridden by the antislavery combination, resulting in the election to the Presidency of a totally sectional President and the dominance of a frankly sectional party which was nonexistent in the South—, the result was the dissolution of the Government and 4 years of bloody war. People today tend to think of serious domestic violence or war as something which happened in the distant past and which would never happen again. But the reason why we have had internal stability in this country since the end of the Reconstruction has been precisely because, from 1877 to the present, with perhaps one exception, during the early years of the New Deal, the doctrine of the concurrent majority has been scrupulously followed. With the close of the experiment of Reconstruction, says Mr. Fischer:

> American politics * * * swing back into its normal path and has never veered far away from it since. Although Calhoun's cause was defeated, his political theory came through the Civil War stronger than ever.

Mr. President, if we in this country try to get away from Calhoun's eternal political truths; if we throw over the doctrine of the concurrent majority; or if we gravely weaken that doctrine, as we will do if we cast aside rule XXII, which is one of its cardinal features—if we do that, Mr. President, our country is headed for disaster. Let us be frank, let us be blunt, and say that our country is headed for civil upheaval. I am not threatening, Mr. President, or predicting, that the conflict or conflicts which will surely arise will be, as in 1860, between the North and the South. I cannot say, I do not know, at the present time, just where the lines of division will be drawn. I do not know whether the divisions will be along sectional lines at all, or whether they will be along economic or ideological lines, or an overlapping combination of all of these. But I do know this: that when a minority, especially if it is a fairly sizable or powerful one, feels the tyranny of the unrestrained majority, feels the oppression of extreme legislation which this unchecked majority will inevitably impose; when the minority can no longer defend itself by means of the shield that is rule XXII—then, Mr. President, then you are going to see that minority—perhaps, indeed probably, in concert with other minorities which have likewise felt majority oppression—take steps to protect itself by whatever means it finds at its disposal—by intrigue, conspiracy, and coup d'etat if possible, by bloody revolution if necessary. Nor could we blame them, we who had taken from them their peaceful defensive shield, their peaceful political form of protection—for there is no more harsh rule than the rule of "King Numbers," no worse tyranny than the tyranny of the unrestrained majority.

Yet that, Mr. President, is what the Senator from Illinois, the Senator from New York, and their allies, would impose upon us—although, of course, this result would be the farthest thing from their intention. How fatal is shortsightedness, how tragic the result of taking the short-range view. Here we have a group of Senators, with the avowed purpose of improving the status and well-being of minority groups in this country. And, tragically taking the short-range view instead of the long view, how do they propose to go about it? By introducing a measure which, if adopted, will do more, in the long run, to curtail the rights and destroy the well-being of minorities than any other measure ever introduced in this body; and which would, at the same time, be detrimental, perhaps fatal, to the well-being of the country as a whole.

Mr. President, the Members of this body now know the facts; they know what is at stake. It is within their power to prevent this tragedy's coming to pass. They have a terrible responsibility. May they have the vision to look beyond the short view and the strength to act in accordance with the long-range well-being, not only of minority groups, but of the United States of America.

During the delivery of Mr. DOUGLAS' speech:

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, it is my deep conviction that proposals for further limiting debate in the United States Senate are matters of grave consequence which should not be adopted lightly without due deliberation, forethought and consideration being given to all the attendant ramifications.

Certainly, debate in the Senate should not be stifled to accomplish some other transient objective.

It was out of that conviction that I, as a member of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration, insisted during the 1st session of the 85th Congress that comprehensive hearings be held on the various resolutions then pending to amend Senate rule XXII.

It was out of that conviction that I endeavored, as chairman of the special subcommittee named to conduct those hearings, to obtain for the first time an expression of "grassroots" sentiment on the question.

It was out of that conviction that I gave careful study to the transcripts of those and previous hearings and to all related materials available to me before writing my report in support of Senate rule XXII as presently written.

And it is out of that conviction, Mr. President, that I now rise to state to this Senate in the most earnest terms at my command the compelling reasons why I feel Senate rule XXII must be upheld unchanged.

Although the question of cloture has been a recurring issue before the Senate since 1917 and hearings previously had been held on the subject in 1947, 1949 and 1951, it was not until 1957 that any effort was made to determine the thinking of the American people about it.

The Special Rules Subcommittee composed of the Senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] and myself heard, either in person or by prepared statement, from 132 Senators, spokesmen for organizations with national memberships and other knowledgeable individuals. While previous hearings had been confined largely to testimony from Senators and paid spokesmen for partisan pressure groups, the 1957 hearings heard from such well-known and respected organizations as the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars and the Sons and Daughters of the American Revolution.

An analysis of the transcript of the 1957 hearings discloses that more than three-fourths of those presenting their views to the subcommittee expressed approval of Senate rule XXII as it now stands and confidence in it as the major bulwark of the people in the maintenance of constitutional government and individual liberty in this Nation.

That transcript, Mr. President, affords Senators for the first time a basis for informed action on this subject. And certainly no Senator who wishes to be responsive to the will of his constituents will wish to vote on any proposal involving this issue before giving careful study to the record of the hearings and the unmistakable conclusions of public opinion it affords.

One of the first things which one studying that transcript will find plainly evident is the fact that those favoring a further erosion of freedom of speech on the floor of this Senate could offer no sounder reason for their position than their desire to see enacted into law force legislation of the character which was resoundingly defeated by the 1st session of the 85th Congress.

Those who predicated their support of proposed changes in Senate rule XXII on the contention that no so-called "civil rights" legislation could be enacted under its present provisions saw their argument exploded in the action of the 1st session of the 85th Congress in placing Public Law 85–315—or, if one prefers, the Civil Rights Act of 1957—on the statute books without resort to rule XXII.

That argument, thus disposed of, there is only one conclusion which can be drawn logically and dispassionately from the actions of those who persist in their efforts to change Senate rule XXII: that their onslaught to stifle freedom of speech on the floor of the Senate is an attack not only on the Senate itself but also on the stature, perquisites, and prerogatives of each Senator in national affairs and every other responsibility incident to the senatorship.

It is an attack which seeks to destroy the best aspects of our Federal/national system and substitute therefor the worst aspects of a national system.

It is an attack which seeks to make big government bigger.

It is an attack which seeks to centralize more and more power in Washington and to set up a government far less responsive to order, honesty, service, and practicality in its dealings with the people.

It is an attack which seeks to put Congress only a short step from the unicameral system.

It is an attack which seeks to eliminate the spirit of compromise and respect for the opinions and feelings of all Senators which has pervaded this Chamber for more than a century and a half.

It is an attack which seeks to eliminate the wise procedure of give-and-take among responsible men and substitute for it the brute force of numbers.

It is an attack which seeks to transform the U.S. Senate from a Chamber where reason prevails to one where all considerations yield to the cry of "knuckle under."

Historically, Mr. President, freedom of debate in the Senate is not a party or sectional device.

It has served the whole country and both political parties well at one time or another.

Legislative matters running through the whole thread of American life, relating to every conceivable activity, have been exposed to full debate in the Senate.

No one can say rightly that the results have been evil or that the country has suffered.

In fact, the benefits of freedom of debate have far outweighed the few instances in which the privilege may have been abused.

Our Nation's progress furnishes ample proof of that.

Standing Senate rule XXII is a wise rule—the result of compromise—which protects full and free discussion of legislative proposals yet serves as a barrier to thwart those few Members who would abuse the privilege of free speech.

Standing Senate rule XXII is fair and to change it again would be to militate against the historic tradition of unlimited debate in the Senate.

The first change in rule XXII to authorize cloture was adopted in 1917 following a bitter controversy over the failure in the Senate of a proposal for arming American merchant ships prior to this Nation's entry into World War I. It was offered as a war measure and, after debate at length, was adopted March 8, 1917, by an overwhelming vote of 76 to 3.

It required the votes of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting to invoke cloture.

Under a later ruling in 1948 by President pro tempore Arthur H. Vandenberg, it was held that the words "pending measure" in original rule XXII applied only to bills and resolutions and not to motions. That meant, of course, that debate on a motion to take up a bill was not subject to cloture under any circumstances.

It was in 1949 that the compromise on rule XXII was effectuated whereby its provisions for cutting off debate was extended, not only to apply to any "pending measure" but also to "any measure, motion or other matter pending before the Senate," and the requirement of "two-thirds of those voting" was changed to "two-thirds of the Senators duly chosen and sworn."

That was the compromise which still is in effect today.

While the two-thirds vote requirement to shut off debate was strengthened by the compromise, at the same time the dread threat of gag rule was extended over every facet of Senate procedure.

Those now attempting to make cloture easier and thus ultimately destroy freedom of debate in the Senate are not satisfied with what is a fair and reasonable compromise.

They complain that Standing Rule XXII in its application thwarts the wishes of the majority. However, authoritative observers of the American legislative process hold that a determined majority of Senators can find ways of passing any measure it desires without resorting to changing the very character and complexion of the body itself. The 1st session of the 85th Congress, as I have pointed out, affords a case in point.

To argue that rule XXII, by holding forth a threat of prolonged debate, serves to prevent Senators from insisting upon legislation with controversial features is to challenge the depth and sincerity of the convictions of all 98 Senators.

Ample means are available at present to overcome what a majority at any time may feel to be needless obstruction in debate. The use of protracted sessions and strict enforcement of all Senate rules afford adequate safeguards to bring to an end even the most determined and prolonged debate.

Whenever any issue of overriding importance to the welfare of the Nation arises, it goes without saying that debate will be limited accordingly.

Frankness compels the observation that the ultimate objective of opponents of free debate in the Senate is cloture by a simple majority vote of Senators present at any given time. Eventual adoption of such a rule would make it possible for 26 Senators, a majority of a quorum, to impose gag rule.

I am convinced that any further concession on our part will bring that disastrous result. It will mean that it will be only a matter of time until that dark shadow completely engulfs and destroys the only free forum left on this earth.

Free debate is the greatest safeguard we have against hidden defects—either calculated or unintentional—in bills which might result in unfairness, discrimination and special privilege for a favored few.

In studying the testimony of representatives of some organizations advocating majority cloture in the Senate, I was shocked and disturbed by some of the language used.

In 1951, for example, there appeared witnesses who branded Senators a selfish, bigoted minority and who called the revered heritages and traditions of the Senate as an institution, myths and folklore. There were those testifying who complained of the absence of political morality in our two major political parties and who lectured Members of this body on what they called the sins of the seniority system.

During the hearings of 1957, such terms as "immoral," "undemocratic," "un-American," "preposterous," "paralyzing," "tyrannical," "absurd," "ugly," and "disgraceful" were applied by witnesses to Standing Rule XXII.

Some of the terms of reference to rule XXII found in the 1958 report favoring majority cloture after 15 days are equally shocking and disturbing.

A few examples of them are that Senate rule XXII: Must be changed to conform with the challenge of Russian missiles and sputniks; paralyzes decision in the Senate; is archaic; would have been opposed at the time of the adoption of the Constitution; is contrary to the views of the Founding Fathers; violates fundamental parliamentary law; is at odds with early Senate procedures; is not supported by the national interest; is not supported by common sense; is not supported by history; stultifies Congress; violates the Constitution; is offensive to the dignity of the Senate; has destroyed the Senate's deliberative function; and thwarts discipline in the Senate.

Those and many other similar unfounded assertions and puerile implications which are sprinkled throughout the testimony about, and reports favoring, cloture resolutions submitted over the years are offensive to the character of every Member of the Senate and to the memories of those now departed who either served under or helped draft Standing Rule XXII. Not only do they insult the intelligence and integrity of all Senators but also they ignore history and distort facts to support partisan ends.

Mr. President, such declarations demonstrate conclusively that those supporting the proposed initiation of gag rule in the Senate have declared war on the United States Senate as an institution.

I do not share their claim that the United States is "failing freedom" in the world.

I do not share their contention that this Senate is a decadent instrumentality "unresponsive to democracy."

I do not admit their assertion that any Member of this Senate lacks either vision or patriotism.

I am indignant at the implication that I, or any other Member of this Senate, would consent to serve under, let alone defend, any rule of procedure which could to any degree be as reprehensible and alien to the American concept as opponents of rule XXII would picture it to be.

One reason given by those advocating that the Senate of the United States surrender its freedom of debate is that the House of Commons of the British Parliament has done so.

What they either forget or choose deliberately to ignore is that much of the difficulty experienced by Great Britain as a nation and as a world power can be laid directly to loss of freedom of debate in the House of Commons and a steady diminution in the power of the House of Lords.

The British system of government is not and never has been comparable to the constitutional system of government created here.

Every right the Englishman has is at the mercy of a majority in the House of Commons.

It was not always so.

A little over 75 years ago unlimited debate in Commons and the veto power in the House of Lords served as mighty barriers against the evils of state socialism.

Those two safeguards restrained competing political parties from inflicting great harm on each other or on the country.

But they were thorns in the flesh of the Liberal, and later the Labor, Party, according to the book "Government and Parliament," by Herbert Morrison.

The former Deputy Prime Minister of the Labor Government, Mr. Morrison, writes interestingly of how free debate was lost in the House of Commons, and I quote from his book beginning on page 202:

> Although there has been talk about the need to expedite business by curtailing private members' rights, it was only in the panic which followed the successful Irish obstruction in the 1880's that the House parted with its long-preserved liberties. One of the most far-reaching of these reforms was the closure (that is to say, the motion "That the question be now put.") It was first used by Mr. Speaker Brand, on February 2, 1881, who, in the course of long debate and considerable obstruction, decided to put the question without further debate. (Before the introduction of the closure members could proceed with debate indefinitely.)

And it was eventually decided that a 3-to-1 majority would be required for a closure in a House of not less than 300 members.

In these days such a rule appears to be distinctly timid and certain to be ineffective in a considerable proportion of Parliaments, but it must be remembered that * * * the principle of unrestricted debate was held in high esteem * * * the idea of closure at all was no doubt looked upon as a revolutionary departure from traditions.

Mr. Morrison explains that the standing order governing closure in Commons today requires only a simple majority which cannot be less than 100 members.

Before 1911 Lords possessed absolute veto power over Commons. As a result of the rejection of the finance bill of 1909 by the Lords, the Liberal Government of that day appealed to the people and won a majority on the issue. A measure to curb the powers of Lords was offered and a promise obtained from the King that, should the Lords reject the bill, he would create a sufficient number of peers to insure its passage.

The threat was effective, and in 1911 the Parliament Act became law. By it the veto of Lords was curtailed to a period of 2 years for bills passed by the Commons in three successive sessions—whether of the same Parliament or not—and abolished altogether in respect of money bills.

The Labor Party in its preelection platform of 1945, "Let Us Face the Future," stated: "We give clear notice that we will not tolerate obstruction of the people's will by the House of Lords."

On October 31, 1947, the Parliament bill was presented to the House of Commons, and passed on December 10. It was rejected by the House of Lords, June 9, 1948.

That bill provided that, in the future, such legislation might be passed into law, notwithstanding the rejection of the House of Lords, if, first, it has been passed by the House of Commons in two successive sessions, instead of three as provided for by the Parliament Act of 1911, and second, 1 year—instead of 2 years—had elapsed between the date of the first second reading in the House of Commons and the date on which it was passed finally by Commons for a second time.

The bill further restricting the power of Lords was again passed by the Commons on September 21, 1948, and again rejected, September 23, 1948.

The bill was passed for the third time by the Commons on November 14, 1949. It was rejected by the Lords on November 29, but received the royal assent and became law on December 16, 1949, under the terms of the Parliament Act of 1911.

Thus was removed from the Government of Britain a great measure of its stability and strength.

The whole world was the loser.

We know the rest and those who have the vision to see beyond the transitory objectives of political advantage should be able to detect the grave danger of that bit of history repeating itself in the United States today.

While the real power of the House of Lords in Parliament in England has been virtually destroyed, it is interesting to note that the House of Lords itself has clung steadfastly to the principle of freedom of debate. Quoting again from Mr. Morrison's book, we find this explanation of how the Lords function together:

A remarkable feature about the House of Lords is that although they have many standing orders, they have few rules or standing orders governing debate. There are two standing orders dealing specifically with debate, namely that a Peer can speak not more than once on any motion (except that the mover can reply) and that debate must be relevant to the question before the House. In addition, there are a number of unwritten rules sanctioned by custom, such as those forbidding quotations from nonministerial speeches in the other House, or the reading of speeches; but rules of debate are few and widely interpreted.

And it should be alluded to here that the Labor Party in Britain does not want, under any circumstances, an institution in that country like the United States Senate. On that point Mr. Morrison wrote:

We should be alarmed if our second Chamber had the great powers of the United States Senate. Whilst willing to respect the House of Lords for the standard and value of its debates, and for its capacity as a chamber of legislative revision, we would not tolerate from such an institution any undue interference with the will of the House of Commons or of the people. * * *

Every citizen of this Nation is thankful that the United States Senate is today the United States Senate in name and in fact.

Every citizen is thankful that its powers and the prerogatives of its Members, as guardians here of the reserved rights of their States and the people, have not been diminished or curtailed.

During the course of some of the hearings in past years on limitation of debate in this body, proponents of majority cloture have stressed the relative disparity in Federal internal revenue collections from the several States as compared with grants-in-aid among the States and have cited that as an argument for their point of view.

I do not agree with their premise in that regard nor do I believe that their argument is valid.

According to statistics of the Bureau of Census of the United States Department of Commerce, I find that a total of 56.3 percent of all Federal internal revenue collections from all sources come from the seven States of California, Michigan, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Texas.

More specifically, figures for the 1956 fiscal year reveal that of the total Federal internal revenue of $75,113 million collected in that year, $42,301 million or 56.3 percent, came from those seven States.

On the other hand, statistics on grants-in-aid for the same 1956 fiscal year show that those same States received only 34.9 percent of the total payments made by the Federal Government to all the States and their local subdivisions under various matching programs.

We find that in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1956, the seven States I have listed received $1,190,677,000, or 34.9 percent, in Federal grants-in-aid out of a total of $3,404,839,000 paid to the States and their local subdivisions by the Federal Government for that 12-month period.

Now some of the larger and richer States feel that the smaller and less populous States are imposing upon them in that regard.

But anyone who reflects on the character of our tax structure will know that that is not true.

United States internal revenue collections are based upon excise taxes levied on trade and business and upon individual and corporate incomes derived from such trade and business.

Concentrated industrialization in the large States which I named accounts for the greater collection of taxes in those areas.

We should not overlook the fact that goods and all manner of services created in those States are consumed in every State and that the productive income of all of our people thereby is channeled into them to pay for those goods and services.

All of us realize that Federal governmental programs must be uniform in their application to all States and that every American must share equally in their benefits.

The right of each Senator to freedom of debate in the United States Senate is a great bulwark protecting both the smaller States and the larger States from imposition on each other.

That is true both in the levying of taxes and in the spending of Government revenue.

If we destroy or further weaken the safeguard of free debate, the small States will be at the mercy of the large States and could very well reap the whirlwind of discrimination in the levying of Federal taxes and, particularly, in their expenditure.

Under such circumstances, outlays for major public improvements in the smaller States would be rare indeed.

Before any of us representing the smaller and less populous States vote to curb debate in this body, we should reflect on its consequences in all matters of legislative consideration.

Certainly, Mr. President, its effects go much further than one bill or any group of bills.

And, more certainly, the danger of cutting off debate when taxes are being levied or when money is being appropriated could lead to the gravest of abuses.

Much has been made of the fact that standing rule XXII gives power to the individual Senator which those so contending maintain should be possessed by the majority, right or wrong. Such a view is contrary to the origin of the Senate as the voice of the individual States in the Federal establishment.

There is no escaping the fact that proposals for further limiting debate in the United States Senate would, if adopted, have the effect of negating the power, the prestige and the perquisites of the Senator as an individual officeholder and of the Senate as a protective instrumentality of the Federal Government.

A former distinguished member of this body, Senator William Knowland, of California, observed at a Rules Committee hearing on this subject in 1947 as follows:

The Senate by sanctioning unlimited debate * * * has in effect so amended the Constitution as to give veto rights to individual Senators and to make it possible for one over one-third of the Senate to confirm such a veto. On such a basis it takes the same two-third's vote to override a Senator bent on filibuster that it does to override a Presidential veto.

Mr. President, the smaller States rightly were given equal representation in the Senate but that influence will be dissipated almost entirely if authorization is voted here for a minority to be gagged on the vote of a simple majority of a quorum.

The former minority leader is not the only one who has recognized that unlimited debate is a vital perquisite incident to the senatorship.

Harry Reed, an official of the CIO, testified in 1951, as follows:

The Congress of Industrial Organizations stands wholly committed to the philosophy that an imperative need in this country is continuing expansion of the democratic process. The CIO does not exempt the Senate of the United States from the application of this philosophy.

One good accomplished by the Myers-Morse resolution was the bringing into full light of day the determination on the part of a willful minority of the Senate that democracy and majority rule should not be allowed to prevail. Appeals based on the so-called prerogatives of Senators operated to prevent any progress (majority cloture) being made at that time.

There are, of course, no such things as senatorial prerogatives. * * * To argue that Senators have special prerogatives is to hark back to the outmoded theory of the anointed one.

It is unthinkable that 34 men, not directly answerable to all of the American people, should be vested with any such tremendous weapon to use against the welfare of all the people. The distrust in the people which they reveal results in a much more logical distrust which the people have for them as public servants.

While I do not agree with Mr. Reed's conclusions nor do I sanction his criticism of the Senate and its Members, I do share his belief that each Senator is vested with a tremendous weapon which he may use to protect the people who sent him here.

One of the frankest and most outspoken witnesses to appear before the Rules Committee in the past to testify for further limitation on debate in the Senate was Will Maslow, general counsel of the American Jewish Congress.

He testified, in part, on October 3, 1951, as follows:

There are many Senators, not from the South, who believe as deeply as the southern Senators in the right of unlimited debate and the reason they believe it is a very simple one.

The prestige and influence of a single Senator is increased immeasurably because of the possibility of a filibuster or the possibility that his wishes must be considered; and it is the Senators from the small States who have to be persuaded that they must consider themselves no longer as ambassadors of sovereign States.

Today you have an assembly where one section of the country—it may be the Silver States one week, the South the next week and opponents of the St. Lawrence Waterway the third week—have a virtual veto power.

That, Mr. President, is what we of this Senate are being asked, among other things, to surrender here today.

Let me, at this time, bring up a fact which is unpleasant but which, nevertheless, cannot be ignored.

During the last quarter of a century we have seen an unending encroachment on the powers of Congress by both the executive and judicial branches. One by one its powers and the prerogatives of its members, have been eaten away.

Congressional authority over the purse, over patronage, over the budget, over war powers and over all other phases of Government operation have, either by delegation or acquiescence, slipped away or been greatly reduced.

It is time that this trend be reversed.

We can strike a mighty blow toward that end, Mr. President, by refusing to surrender our right of freedom of speech on the floor of the Senate.

No more eloquent defense of the right of the individual Senator to the power which comes through freedom of debate has ever been penned than that written by the able and talented reporter and writer, William S. White, in his book, "Citadel—The Story of the United States Senate."

Another distinguished and erudite journalist, Arthur Krock, described that book thusly:

Mr. White has accomplished three tasks I did not think could be done in one small volume, or in so brilliant a weave of highly readable information and deep political philosophy. He has reminded a forgetful people (1) that the United States was established, not as a democracy, but as a Federal Union and Republic; (2) that the State equality composition of the Senate was carefully designed to maintain this establishment; (3) that the design preserves the constitutional rights of minorities from the precipitate and emotional tyranny of majorities.

I join Mr. Krock in commending "Citadel" to the American people. It should be in every home, school, college, and public library in the land.

Mr. White, in having written his book, has performed a great service for his country.

A brief review of some of the most important points he makes regarding the function of the Senate as an institution and the role it plays in the stream of American life are in order here.

He writes:

Over the affairs of Republic, in short, the mandate of the Senate is for practical purposes limitless.

It is a checkmate on big government and big everything else, he says—even the big majority—for the Senate is the jewel in the cask where contraction, not expansion, is held most dear.

Writing eloquently of the precise role filled by the Senate in our Government, Mr. White stated:

Conscious though one is of the abuse of senatorial power one glories nevertheless in the circumstances that there is such a place, where big Senators may rise and flourish from small States.

For the institution protects and expresses that last, true heart of democratic theory, the triumphant distinction and oneness of the individual and of the little State, the infinite variety in each of which is the juice of national life.

It is perhaps often forgotten that the democratic ideal is not all majority; that, indeed, at its most exquisite moments the ideal is not for the majority of all but actually for the minority of one.

The Senate, therefore, may be seen as a uniquely constitutional place in that it is here, and here alone, outside the courts—to which access is not always easy—that the minority will again and again be defended against the majority's most passionate will.

This is a large part of the whole meaning of the institution. Deliberately it puts Rhode Island. in terms of power, on equal footing with Illinois. Deliberately by its tradition and practice of substantially unlimited debate, it rarely closes the door to any idea, however wrong, until all that can possibly be said has been said, and said again. The price sometimes is high. The time killing, sometimes, seems intolerable and dangerous. The license, sometimes, seems endless; but he who silences the cruel and irresponsible man today must first recall that the brave and lonely man may in the same way be silenced tomorrow.

For illustration, those who denounce the filibuster against, say, the compulsory civil-rights program, might recall that the weapon has more than one blade and that today's pleading minority could become tomorrow's arrogant majority. They might recall, too, that the techniques of communication, and with them the drenching power of propaganda, have vastly risen in our time when the gaunt aerials thrust upward all across the land. They might recall that the public is not always right all at once and that it is perhaps not too bad to have one place in which matters can be examined at leisure, even if a leisure uncomfortably prolonged.

Author White observes that from a small-State point of view to promote the idea of cloture is to sharpen a dangerous weapon. He draws this well-reasoned conclusion on the subject:

It is, in the nature of the Senate, absolutely necessary for the small States to maintain the concept of the minority's veto power, having in mind that it is only within the institution that his power can be asserted or maintained. (In the House, for example, New York State has 43 voices to a single one for Nevada.)

As one who has long been intimately associated with reporting the activities of the Senate, Mr. White makes this interesting observation:

Where a powerful majority really wants a bill it will find means to have its way, cloture or no cloture.

Without doubt the most eloquent defense of freedom of debate in the Senate was delivered by the late Senator James A. Reed, of Missouri, in speaking against the Underwood resolution in 1926, which, if adopted, would have authorized cloture on money bills.

During the course of the debate Senator Reed quoted the late Senator Lodge, sponsor of the force bill, as saying that he was convinced that the bill was wrong and that the result of the filibuster on it had been a great blessing to the country.

Senator Reed, in a brilliant address, emphasized with great clarity that ours is not a country of unbridled majority rule but that the Constitution was written, in large part, to protect against its excesses. The Declaration of Independence, he declared, proclaimed for our posterity that there are limitations on majority rule.

The majority has been wrong oftener than it has been right in all the course of time—

He observed.

Tracing majority wrongs from the Crucifixion of Christ to the "horrible thing called slavery," Senator Reed said that the real basis for our country's greatness lies in the one great fact that we have allowed the individual in this land the opportunity to develop and express himself.

And then he declared:

As long as we can keep this forum free, as long as a vigorous and determined minority can prevent the passage of a statute, so long this country will be safe, reasonably safe, at least, for no great act of treachery can ever be consummated where there are not some brave souls to stand in its resistance and to stand to the end.

Mr. President, I have compiled a few other selected quotations from several illustrious present and former Senators and from the late President Franklin D. Roosevelt sustaining the principle of free debate and the right of every State to an effective voice in our national councils. They are worthy of the careful consideration of each Member of this body and I shall read them at this time:

Vice President John C. Calhoun in 1841:

There never has been a body in this or any other country in which, for such a length of time, so much dignity and decorum of debate has been maintained.

Senator RICHARD B. RUSSELL on October 23, 1951:

The Senate * * * has never fundamentally failed the American people.

Senator Walter F. George on February 8, 1947:

The very genius of the American system of government is the judicial protection of the rights of one man against the ninety and nine.

Senator JOHN C. STENNIS on January 26, 1949:

I warn some of the Members of the Senate who espouse the cause of this change in rules, that if they are successful, their stature in national affairs will be reduced.

Senator William E. Borah in May, 1925:

I have never known a good measure killed by a filibuster or a debate. I have known of a vast number of bad measures, which could not have been killed in any other way except through long discussion and debate.

Senator HARRY F. BYRD on February 11, 1947:

I have seen many very bad bills killed by a free debate in the Senate that would otherwise have been passed, if we hadn't had such debate. I think one is the FEPC Act. Senator Millikin made one of the greatest speeches ever made in the United States Senate after that debate had gone on for about 10 days.

Senator LISTER HILL on February 1, 1949:

Take from the Senate this right of free and unlimited debate * * * and then your Senate is no more than any other legislative body * * * if you deny free and unlimited debate * * * you have changed the character of the Senate of the United States. You cannot change the character of the Senate of the United States without changing the Government of the United States.

Senator CARL HAYDEN on October 23, 1951:

In matters affecting the relationship of one State or one region of the United States with another, the principle of equality of States in the Union is one of the highest importance. In grave international situations the unity of the Nation becomes all important.

Senator WILLIAM J. FULBRIGHT on February 1, 1949:

The facts are that this rule (XXII), whether by design or accident, has become a part of our intricate system of checks and balances, some of which are rooted in the Constitution, others in custom, but all of which, to a large extent, have contributed to our stability as a government and our compatibility as a people.

Senator Eugene Millikin on February 9, 1946:

The majority of any party in power would find the suppression of free speech a convenient method of expediting what it considered useful and urgent legislation. It is always annoying to have errors exposed, and it would not be long before a majority of one decided that for political purposes it should retain the illusion of infallibility by preventing exposure here of its errors. And then it would not be long until corrupt and even more ominous legislation might be shepherded through this Chamber in enforced silence.

Senator Pat McCarran in a letter dated September 24, 1951:

To invoke cloture by a simple majority will prevent filibustering to be sure; but it would also stop all real deliberation. Cloture is the foundation of machine rule. Once that foundation is established, the mechanics of machine rule will become very simple. One or two, or a handful of bosses then will be able easily to obtain and exercise supremacy. They can use the party-caucus system, employing the principle of control through a majority of a majority which is inevitably a minority of the whole membership.

President Franklin D. Roosevelt in a radio address on States rights delivered March 2, 1930:

The preservation of this "home rule" by the States is not a cry of jealous Commonwealths seeking their own aggrandizement at the expense of sister States. It is a fundamental necessity if we are to remain a truly united country. The whole success of our democracy has not been that it is a democracy wherein the will of a bare majority of the total inhabitants is imposed upon the minority, but that it has been a democracy where through a division of government into units called States the rights and interests of the minority have been respected and have always been given a voice in the control of our affairs.

The moment a mere numerical superiority by either States or voters in this country proceeds to ignore the needs and desires of the minority, and, for their own selfish purposes or advancement, hamper or oppress that minority, or debar them in any way from equal privileges and equal rights—that moment will mark the failure of our constitutional system.

We have been told, Mr. President, that, unless the United States destroys freedom of speech in the Senate and adopts all manner of measures regulating human morals and racial and religious conduct, Russia will exploit it against us.

Mr. President, it is with all due deference and respect that I am constrained to inquire as to just whom we are trying to impress?

Why must we alter our internal policy and be panicked by the provocation of Soviet propaganda?

It is said that, if America would only destroy free debate in the Senate, she would "electrify the world."

Well, let us examine that contention a bit.

By destroying our heritage, we are trying to impress some of the South American countries where all rights are at the mercy of military juntas and our own Vice President is stoned and spat upon while on a good will visit?

Are we trying to impress the Communist butchers who bound the hands of American soldiers and machinegunned them in the backs after making them dig their own graves?

Are we trying to impress the Arab sheiks who inflict harsh and unusual punishments on their people such as cutting off the right hand of a hungry beggar caught stealing a crust of bread?

Are we trying to impress the savage tribal chieftains of Africa?

Are we trying to impress the Dictator Nasser of Egypt who knows no law but force?

Are we trying to impress Nehru and members of his Congress Party of India where the caste system, sacred cows, communalism, and astrology are election issues?

When this Nation reaches the point that our leaders are more concerned about what a foreign Communist propaganda agency does or says than they are about preserving the internal structure of our Government, protecting the rights and liberties of the American people and maintaining the reserved powers of the States and their citizens; then I say, Mr. President, we are in bad trouble.

Our system of government as it stands today is unmatched and unequaled anywhere in the world.

More important, our system has proved its worth and has always held this Nation together except on one unfortunate occasion.

Our Republic, and all that it connotes, forms the basis for American unity.

Our Founding Fathers planned it that way.

There is no room in this country today for cleavages among its regions and people.

Our country will not survive if all of our energies and resources are dissipated on fancied differences and internecine strife.

The U.S. Senate is our great safety valve which prevents impasses from developing in our Nation and where seemingly irreconcilable conflicts are amicably resolved.

And the basis for it is the right of every Senator, regardless of the size of the State he represents, to talk things out before the country.

The only real protection remaining for States which find themselves from time to time in the minority on any given issue in this Senate is a safe two-thirds rule on limiting debate.

That is what we have now, Mr. President, and it is my plea that we of this Senate will resoundingly uphold it as written.

No Senator concerned about the future of constitutional government in the United States can vote otherwise.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I have listened to the remarks of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS]. Always he is entertaining, and he makes his points clearly and well.

At this late hour I shall not undertake to make a detailed answer to what he has said about the South. With all due deference to him, let me say that when he speaks of the problems which he acknowledges—and it is natural for him to do so—I believe his statements show that he really does not realize the practical side of many of the problems to which he refers.

He has referred to some sort of alleged combination or conspiracy of southern Senators with Senators in the conservative wing of the Republican Party, in 1949, who were said to have brought about the present rule XXII and to have formulated it in a way so injurious to the Nation. But, Mr. President, under the same rule of 1949 there was passed in 1958, as he has said, the civil rights bill which he says goes so far in meeting this problem, but which he says is not enforced properly.

Furthermore, it was under the same 1949 rule that section 3 of the civil rights bill was taken out of that measure. That was done here on the floor of the Senate, and was done by majority vote. The bill came before the Senate under the rules. The bill was passed under the rules. Title III, which the Senator from Illinois now says was poorly written, and which he wishes to have reenacted with more detailed provisions, was voted out of the bill here on the floor of the Senate. That action was taken by intelligent Senators who were acting under their responsibility; and that action was taken by majority vote. A majority was required in order to eliminate that provision from that measure. Furthermore, as I remember, the majority which voted to take such action was a fairly large majority, not merely a slim one.

Thus, Mr. President, in view of those facts, the present rule XXII must not be entirely bad; it must have some virtue. It must not be the cause of the problems of the country in the case of civil rights and other matters.

Mr. President, aside from the problem of so-called civil rights legislation, I firmly believe that another motive is prompting the groups promoting this change in the Senate Rules. I believe that once the protection that this rule offers to responsible and sound fiscal management of our Government has been destroyed or its effectiveness impaired, we may look forward to a host of new bills which could never survive the legislative process under the scrutiny and freedom of debate presently available under rule XXII. I believe that these proposals will range from the moderate liberalization of present Federal spending programs to what might, in my opinion and that of a number of others here, be considered irresponsible, reckless and socialistic.

For many years I have watched with growing concern the development of various blocs that wield great political influence, not only in special interest legislation, but also in general legislation. I believe that these blocs are a serious threat to our form of government. I believe this threat grows from year to year, and is one of the most serious problems facing our Nation in the decades ahead. We even hear serious talk of a Farm Party, and a Labor Party.

These blocs are well organized and well financed, and have demonstrated that they can also operate very effectively in the election of candidates to high office.

Even under the existing structure of our political organization and our system of government there is the ever-present danger that any one of a number of large and powerful pressure groups may, in effect, take over the power of government.

An alliance of two medium-sized but strongly organized and disciplined pressure groups could accomplish the same purpose. Only the statesmanlike self-restraint of certain leaders in some of these groups has prevented this power from reaching its full potential.

These groups already have a large voice in the selection of candidates, in the writing of party platforms, and in the formulation of legislative policy and administration policy.

The strongest and greatest stumbling block to purely special interest legislation has historically been the U.S. Senate. Here many unwise proposals have quietly died. Often these unlamented deaths have been attributed to the pigeonholing of bills in Senate committees or to the threat of filibuster.

If the Senate rules are changed materially, many of these Trojan horses will be revived and new ones will appear, their chances of passage materially enhanced. The last great barrier to domination of governmental policy by pressure groups will have been breached. Many measures will then pass the Senate under a gag rule imposed by majority vote.

Judgment will be sacrificed to political expediency, and the protection which the existing rule XXII now offers against an irresponsible legislative policy will have been lost. Some examples of what I refer to are:

First. The socialization of medicine, the iniquitous regimentation of all health and medical services under regulations prohibiting both the doctor and the patient from exercising the freedom of choice so necessary to inspire mutual confidence in the doctor-patient relationship.

Second. Bureaucratic dictation of the unemployment compensation program from Washington, with State participation becoming submerged.

Third. The housing program to be dictated at the whim of master planners in Washington who have little knowledge of, and less concern for, purely local conditions.

Fourth. The gradual taking over of our educational system by the Federal Government, through Federal appropriations.

Fifth. Many other socialistic and extravagant programs will be conceived, and could become realities. They will all be directed toward centralization of government through vast Federal expenditures, further usurping rights and powers now reserved to the States and to the individuals.

National bankruptcy may well be the price our country will pay for a major change in the Senate rules. The changes I have mentioned are only the immediate effects. If we tamper with these rules, I feel certain a gag rule will come within the next few years, and that within a decade the Senate will have ceased to be a major deliberative body. It will become a mere annex to the House of Representatives; the minorities now represented here will no longer enjoy the protection the Senate has offered. If the rules may be changed whimsically, these changes will come with every change in the political fortune of either party.

I do not believe that the Nation wants, or is prepared to pay, this exorbitant price of such a change.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the role.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

"SHALL THE MAIN QUESTION BE NOW PUT?"[1]

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, 6 years ago, 2 days after I had taken the oath to be a member of the Senate, I cast my vote against the filibuster. Once again in January 1957, I cast my vote in the same way. The intervening months have not changed my views. To the contrary, they have strengthened my views that the need to change the Senate rules governing debate in the Senate is even more imperative today than it was then. And I trust that now, as we enter the 86th Congress, the Senate will finally do what it should have done many years ago.

[1] The previous question being moved and seconded, the question from the Chair shall be: "Shall the main question be now put?" And if the nays prevail, the main question shall not then be put. (Rule IX, adopted April 16, 1789.)

Within the last few days, millions of people throughout the world have heard President Eisenhower's message of "peace on earth, good will toward men," broadcast from the Atlas satellite now in orbit about the earth. And even more recently, the Russians have sent a satellite beyond the moon, although what it is broadcasting I cannot say. Here are dramatic reminders, if any were needed, that we live in a new age, an age marked on the one hand by grave peril to the cause of freedom, and on the other by the promise of man's conquest of all the alien forces of nature. It is altogether fitting that we in the Senate give sober consideration to an assessment of the adequacy of our institutions to meet both the threat and the promise of the space age. And we intend that the constitutional freedoms guaranteed to Americans since 1789 shall continue as part of the American system in this intriguing era on which we are now entered. Such a freedom is freedom of expression—freedom of speech, as the Constitution puts it. That will remain in all the days and years ahead a part of our way of life, in and out of Government.

But that right, like any right, ought not to be abused. Thus American laws of libel and slander place reasonable limits on our right of expression. And in the Senate, a rule exists to put an end, finally, to interminable debate—the unhappy fact being, however, that it has not proved a successful or useful means of terminating unlimited debate.

II. THE PRESENT RULE XXII

The present rule for limiting debate was adopted in 1949, although its real origins go back to the eve of America's entry into the First World War. As now written, rule XXII provides that 2 calendar days after presentation to the Senate of a written motion for cloture signed by 16 Senators, cloture may be imposed by an affirmative vote of two-thirds of the Senators duly chosen and sworn; that is 66 of the entire Senate membership of 98. If such cloture motion be adopted, each Senator is thereafter limited to a total of 1 hour's time in debate on the pending matter. The rule further provides that even this difficult cloture may not be imposed on any motion or resolution to change any of the Standing Rules of the Senate, including rule XXII itself. The present rule prevents the imposition of cloture unless 66 Senators appear and vote in favor of a cloture motion. This means, in practice, that it is not necessary to vote against a cloture motion to help prevent its adoption—if fewer than 66 vote in favor of cloture it cannot be imposed. Absence is thus made equivalent to a vote against cloture. A minority of 32 Senators can, by use of a filibuster, absolutely prevent the Senate from taking any action—in the only way it can, by voting—even though a great majority of Senators wish to vote up or down on the matter confronting them.

As matters now stand, this is more restrictive than the original cloture rule adopted in 1917, following the successful filibuster of the bill to arm merchant ships.

III. ORIGINS OF RULE XXII

President Wilson had asked Congress for authority to arm merchant ships on February 26, 1917, as a consequence of the German High Command's determination to resume unrestricted submarine warfare. The House of Representatives passed the President's bill by an overwhelming majority (403 to 14). A different fate was in store for the bill in the Senate, however, for here a small group of 11 Senators successfully filibustered the bill to death before adjournment on March 4, despite the fact that 75 Senators signed a statement which concluded by saying:

> We desire this statement entered in the RECORD to establish the fact that the Senate favors the legislation and would pass it, if a vote could be had.

Mr. Wilson issued a statement on March 4 expressive of his great wrath:

> In the immediate presence of a crisis fraught with more subtle and far-reaching possibilities of national danger than any the Government has known within the whole history of its international relations the Congress has been unable to act either to safeguard the country or to indicate the elementary rights of its citizens. More than 500 of 531 Members of the two Houses were ready and anxious to act; the House of Representatives had acted, by an overwhelming majority; but the Senate was unable to act because a group of 11 Senators had determined that it should not. * * * The Senate of the United States is the only legislative body in the world which cannot act when its majority is ready for action. A little group of willful men, representing no opinion but their own, have rendered the great Government of the United States helpless and contemptible * * *.
> The only remedy is that the rules of the Senate shall be so altered that it can act. The country can be relied on to draw the moral. I believe that the Senate can be relied on to supply the means of action and save the country from disaster.

The result came quickly in a special session of Congress and the adoption of a cloture rule in the Senate, which remained unaltered until amended in 1949. The original rule permitted the imposition of cloture by a two-thirds vote of those voting, a significant difference from the present requirement.

The rule adopted March 8, 1917, was as follows:

> If at any time a motion, signed by 16 Senators, to bring to a close the debate upon any pending measure is presented to the Senate, the Presiding Officer shall at once state the motion to the Senate, and 1 hour after the Senate meets on the following calendar day but one, he shall lay the motion before the Senate and direct that the Secretary call the roll, and, upon ascertaining that a quorum is present, the Presiding Officer shall, without debate, submit to the Senate by an aye-and-nay vote the question:
>
> "Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate shall be brought to a close?"
> And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by a two-thirds vote of those voting, then said measure shall be the unfinished business to the exclusion of all other business until disposed of.
> Thereafter no Senator shall be entitled to speak in all more than 1 hour on the pending measure, the amendments thereto, and motions affecting the same, and it shall be the duty of the Presiding Officer to keep the time of each Senator who speaks. Except by unanimous consent, no amendment shall be in order after the vote to bring the debate to a close, unless the same has been presented and read prior to that time. No dilatory motion, or dilatory amendment, or amendment not germane shall be in order. Points of order, including questions of relevancy, and appeals from the decision of the Presiding Officer, shall be decided without debate.

The Constitution provides that "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." In the House of Representatives, each new Congress elected every 2 years is a new body that adopts its own rules. It did that the other day, as indicated, in a matter of seconds. Usually, when a new Congress convenes, the House votes to adopt the rules of its predecessors. Until that motion is adopted, the House has no rules of its own and must operate according to general parliamentary law.

In the Senate, procedure is different. With only one-third of its membership elected each 2 years, the other two-thirds holding over, the theory has been advanced that the Senate is a continuing body that need not adopt new rules at each new session of Congress. This theory has been repeatedly challenged with respect to the right of the Senate to adopt new rules. It has been challenged in this debate. I have challenged it. I repeat that challenge now.

It may be that the Senate is a continuing body for some purposes, but it is not for all purposes. For example, bills not enacted by both Houses during a session of Congress, need to be reintroduced. Moreover, committee assignments need to be made with each new session of Congress.

IV. EMERGENCY DECLARATION AND CONGRESSIONAL INACTION

Parliamentary paralysis of the kind encountered by President Wilson would today be fatal to the Nation. In fact, a filibuster or the suggestion of one, given the circumstances of our current defense posture could—indeed, I think would—bring down upon the Republic a constitutional crisis completely destructive of national unity at the very moment when the need for such unity would be paramount. In 1942, the late President Roosevelt spoke about inherent powers and powers borrowed from the people which he threatened to use in the absence of congressional action on legislation he deemed important. He said:

> In the event that the Congress should fail to act, and act adequately, I shall accept the responsibility, and I will act. * * * The President has the powers, under the Constitution and under congressional acts, to take measures necessary to avert a disaster which would interfere with the winning of the war.

The American people do not approve of the concept of government by executive fiat. That is not part of the American system. It must, however, realistically be conceded that in times of emergency—perhaps, only in the gravest of emergencies—some of the exactitudes of our constitutional process become bent and bruised, or cast aside. Another way of saying the same thing is simply to observe that the theory of "inherent powers" and its potential application looms largest in periods of crisis.

Suppose the Chief Executive asks the Congress for what he deems to be important legislation. Suppose the House approves it and suppose it is scheduled for debate in the Senate. Then suppose that one-third of the Senators plus one announce that they intend to filibuster it to death, in spite of the fact that two-thirds of the Senate less one are in favor of it? Do Senators not think that there would be infinitely greater impetus for the President to apply the "inherent powers" doctrine under these circumstances, than if, simply, on a rollcall vote in either House, the President's recommendations were defeated? A measure—any measure—not voted upon in the Senate because of filibustering proves nothing at all and establishes nothing at all, except, perhaps, that there is something wrong with the Senate rules of procedure. I suggest that the best interests of America abhor a vacuum equally with Mother Nature.

To his infinite credit President Eisenhower sought congressional confirmation for his authority to take what action he believed necessary in the Formosa Straits in 1955. Given the nature of the crises which have confronted us abroad, in Lebanon, in Suez, in Quemoy, in Berlin, the President could well have resorted to the application of the "inherent powers" doctrine. It is our great good fortune that he has restricted the use of his vast powers in deference to every safeguard of our constitutional system. Where by cleansing and improving our Senate procedures we can strengthen the machinery of our tripartite system, we will, I think, be making a real contribution to strengthening our government itself.

For it is indeed true that emergency government has become the norm for 20th century constitutional states. The health, welfare, and military effectiveness of a modern industrial nation depend upon the harmonious interaction of a complex, interdependent system of production and transportation facilities. The interruption of this process at any of a myriad of critical points would have ramifying effects which might disrupt the supply of essential civilian and military materials, possibly undermining the economic health or military security of the Nation. The urban concentration of population and the refinement of communication devices and techniques for manipulating public opinion make it increasingly possible to instill in the civilian population an hysteria and terror which could effectively thwart mobilization. Realization of the magnitude of the problem and a pervasive recognition of the seemingly never-ending Communist menace influence the process of continuous redefinition of the balance between delegated authority and individual liberty which is the essential task of democratic government in war as in peace.

All this is by way of saying that the Senate can be delayed, if not effectively prevented, from passing judgment on needed legislation if a determined minority so desires. Before considering briefly the history of action under rule XXII, I should like to emphasize another facet of Executive decisionmaking that led a former Member of this Chamber to seek a constitutional amendment to restrict Presidential bypassing of the Senate. I refer, of course, to the increasing use in recent years of "Executive agreements" as a means of circumventing the participation by the Senate in the treatymaking process. Mr. Walter Lippmann in a recent column called attention to the constitutional requirement of Senate ratification of treaties, noting that the votes of two-thirds of those present and voting is required.

From that, he argued that a two-thirds rule in the Senate on certain types of voting has constitutional precedent and reasonableness behind it. I would respectfully point out that by resort to "Executive agreements" the Chief Executive may today completely bypass the Senate in the business of foreign relations in a fashion unheard of when the Constitution was written. Thus, rather than a vote of two-thirds of the Senate participating in our foreign policy by constitutionally passing judgment on treaties, the use by the executive branch of "Executive agreements" eliminates the Senate from any participation at all in this field.

I do not desire to discuss here the theory and practice of Executive agreements for day-by-day or month-by-month transaction of our governmental business with other nations. For the purposes of these comments, I simply observe that, in my view, this constitutional two-thirds rule on treaty questions ought not to be an argument pro or con on the pending issue.

Certainly the last quarter of a century has produced far-reaching changes with which our present rules and procedures simply do not cope.

V. DEBATE IN THE SENATE, 1917–57

Twenty-two cloture votes were taken in the Senate after adoption of the first cloture rule in 1917. In the 32 years from the first cloture rule to its amended version in 1949, 19 cloture motions were voted on and only 4—2 of them during debates on the Versailles Treaty in 1919 and adherence to the World Court in 1926—received the necessary two-thirds vote.

(1) THE TREATY OF VERSAILLES

In November 1919, when it seemed evident that five irreconcilables intended to keep the ratification of the Treaty of Versailles under debate until the end of the session, a cloture motion was submitted, but was held by the Vice President to be out of order since it sought to limit debate only on the proposed reservations. Later, on the same day, November 13, Senator Lodge, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, filed a cloture motion signed by 30 Republicans, and 2 days later this was adopted by a vote of 78 to 16. Debate under the cloture rule began at once, and continued during the sessions of 4 days, occupying in all about 20 hours. At least 50 Senators took part in the debate, but not more than 10 of them used themselves of the full 1-hour allowance. The final vote was taken at the end of the session of November 19.

(2) THE WORLD COURT PROTOCOL

January 22, 1926, when attempts to secure a unanimous consent agreement for a vote upon the resolution for adherence to the World Court had been repeatedly blocked by objections, a cloture motion was filed, signed by 43 Senators—3 times as many as the rule prescribed. In the 2-day interval before taking the test vote, resort to cloture was strongly opposed. Senator Reed of Missouri, for example, kept reminding his colleagues in the Senate, that only unlimited debate had saved them from the force bill and the antilynching bill, and he warned them that they were preparing a noose to choke themselves to death. "As long as I am in the Senate, if cloture is applied now, I will help to apply it at other times." To this Senator Robinson retorted: "I am not terrified when the Senator threatens that, if I do what I know to be right, he will do what he knows to be wrong in other instances."

It was recognized, however, that unless cloture were applied, the tactics of the World Court opponents would delay a vote until the revenue bill must be given the right of way, and thus postpone the decision indefinitely. Even at the appointed hour when the Vice President started to submit a cloture motion, one Senator made a last-minute effort to avoid recourse to the use of cloture by asking unanimous consent that he might offer a unanimous-consent agreement, setting a day for the vote, but this was blocked. By a vote of 68 to 26—all but two members voting—a cloture was applied.

The cloture rule of 1917 was originally criticized, because through the allowance of 1 hour of speaking time to each Senator, 96 hours, or 16 legislative days, might still be consumed in debate. But in this second successful application of the rule, the motion for cloture was carried on the afternoon of January 25, and the final vote on the World Court resolution was taken 2 days thereafter. Some 25 Senators took part in debate under the rule, most of them speaking in favor of the resolution. Several Senators explained that, though they had voted on principle against the application of cloture, they heartily advocated adherence to the World Court. The opponents presented reservations, most of them obviously hostile in intent. At the end of 2 days of debate the resolution for adherence to the World Court, modified by five reservations, was adopted by a vote of 76 to 17.

During the precloture period, debate upon the issue lagged, so that twice a decisive vote on the World Court was only prevented by one Senator's reading of Washington's Farewell Address with interpolations of utterly irrelevant matter, and his reading of one of his own stump speeches delivered in the previous campaign. Although Senator Reed spoke repeatedly at length, he was criticized for holding back parts of his speeches from the RECORD, thus depriving his opponents of a definite basis for prompt rebuttal.

In a Chicago speech Senator Reed declared:

> By methods as revolutionary as they were detestable, we were rushed into the Court. * * * I appeal from the gag rule of the Senate to the ungagged judgment of the American people.

The RECORD makes it irrefutably plain that there was no rushing. In the precloture debate the two sides of this 3-year-old issue were ably presented by Senator Walsh, of Montana, and Senator Borah, of Idaho. Many of the Senate speeches were either duplications or dilutions of the main arguments. Senator Reed's suggestion, that the date fixed for ending the debate be postponed a month, came at a time when one of his supporters, who had succeeded in spreading his own speech over only 15 minutes, was acknowledging:

> I doubt very much if they—the discussion—can be materially enlarged except by tedious repetition.

Meanwhile, filibustering went on unchecked. Prior to 1933 a favorite time to launch such an effeort was the closing weeks or days of a short session, since all that was necessary to victory was to hold out until a fixed hour for adjournment—noon of March 4. The 20th amendment, putting an end to short sessions, was expected to make filibusters rarer. Yet, one of the most notable filibusters of the time, however, that of Senator Huey Long against a branch-banking bill, occurred in the very first session after the amendment was proclaimed. Finally, the filibuster was abandoned, and the bill subsequently passed.

We have seen that situation in the Senate in the past, and I suppose we shall see it again in the future. During the last hours of every session, each year, if certain Senators are opposed to what is then pending, the opportunity is immediately available to them to take the floor and hold it and prevent other Members of the Senate from voting either for or against the pending legislation.

One of the most candid declarations of the purposes of a filibuster occurred during the debate on the Dyer anti-lynching bill from November 20 to December 4, 1922. From the moment this bill was introduced it became impossible to transact all legislative business until the Dyer bill was formally abandoned on the last day of the session.

Once the Presiding Officer ruled that the motion to take up the bill was debatable, the first Senator to obtain recognition began:

> Mr. President, understanding that the motion is debatable, I wish to make some remarks upon the criticism that has been directed toward Monsieur Clemenceau.

And for the rest of the day Clemenceau and French policy remained the themes for discussion.

The purpose and strength of 10 opponents of the anti-lynching bill are best summarized in the words of the late Senator Oscar W. Underwood of Alabama:

> It is perfectly apparent that you are not going to get an agreement to vote on this bill * * *. I want to say right now to the Senate that if the majority party insist on this procedure, they are not going to pass the bill and they are not going to do any other business * * *. We are going to transact no other business until we have an understanding about this bill * * *. We are willing to take the responsibility.
> This is not the first time that I have ever engaged in a filibuster. I do not often do it, and I do not ever intend to do it without adequate justification * * *. This proposal is fundamental. We regard this bill as a rape of the Constitution * * *. If we agree that we are merely going to fight the Dyer bill, and let the majority lay it aside and transact such business as they want to transact, they will have it as a bumper against anything we may want to do.

Filibusters have occurred against all variety of subjects and proposed legislation. The technique has varied from time to time, sometimes a relay team system being used, sometimes only one man holding the floor.

Filibusters have occupied the time of the Senate on numerous occasions including some in the 1930's that did not enhance the reputation of the Senate.

Four well-organized filibusters upon the perennial question of Federal anti-poll-tax legislation succeeded in 1942, 1944, 1946, and 1948.

Other subjects besides those concerned with proposed civil rights legislation have been the basis for extended debate in the Senate, a noteworthy example being the so-called tidelands oil bill, which occurred shortly after I entered the Senate. Debate extended over a 35-day period and enabled one of our present colleagues to establish a new record for the longest single speech in the Senate—22 hours and 26 minutes.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks a table entitled "Legislation Delayed or Defeated by Filibusters," prepared by the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the table will be printed in the RECORD, as requested.

VI. THE FIGHT FOR REFORM OF THE SENATE RULES

Mr. KUCHEL. No other Vice President in our history ever undertook as forceful an attack upon the Senate rules as did the late Charles G. Dawes. He had scarcely assumed his duties as Vice President when he began a call for reform of the rules. Thoroughgoing reform was demanded "not only by American public opinion, but I venture to say in the individual consciences of the Members of the Senate itself." His strongest condemnation was reserved for that feature of the rules which made it possible for a minority, or even a single individual Senator to kill legislation providing the revenue to pay the expenses of Government, or to force the President of the United States to call a special session of Congress.

The memory of the First World War and the filibuster which killed appropriations to the Army, the Navy, and for the operation of defense transportation facilities, only a month before the United States entered the war, was still prominent in the Vice President's thinking: "Who would dare maintain that in the last analysis the right of the Senate to act should ever be subordinated to the right of one Senator to make a speech."

Throughout his term as President of the Senate, Vice President Dawes carried on his declared intention to see the Senate rules altered. And as he retired from office, he referred reproachfully to the Senate as being, among modern deliberative bodies, "the only one that has parted with the power to allot its time to the consideration of subjects before it in accordance with their relative importance."

A few years later the then majority leader of the Senate, the late Alben Barkley—I recall him most proudly because it was before him that I took my oath to serve in the United States Senate—declared in 1938:

> I agree that the rules of the Senate are the most archaic conglomeration of contradictory decisions that ever prevailed in any parliamentary or legislative body * * * I think the rules of the Senate ought to be revamped. They ought to be modernized. They ought to be so changed as to make the Senate a self-governing body, which it is not now.

The present rule was adopted in 1949 as a result of opposition to a proposed civil rights program revived by President Truman and requiring fair employment practices, prohibiting lynching, and forbidding poll-tax restrictions upon voting in Federal elections. With five different resolutions pending for strengthening the cloture rule—two of them supported by the President substituting a simple majority for two-thirds as the vote required for applying cloture—a strong bloc filibustered successfully against items in the President's program, and then pursuaded the rules and administration committee and finally the Senate itself to accept two compromise amendments to the cloture rule of 1917, the first requiring the prescribed two-thirds vote to be calculated, not as before, simply on the number of Senators present, but on the body's total membership, and the second expressly exempting from cloture any motion to consider a proposed change of existing Senate rules. With these modifications, the 1917 rule still stands. Time has proved the weakness of the present rule.

The proposal to amend rule XXII provides that debate may be limited by a vote of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting 2 days after 16 Senators have filed a petition for this purpose. It also provides that 15 legislative days, exclusive of Sundays and holidays, after the presentation to the Senate of a petition signed by 16 Senators, the Senate may impose cloture by a simple majority vote of the whole number of Senators duly chosen and sworn. In effect, this would mean no less than 2, and more probably up to 4 weeks of debate on legislation before cloture could be obtained.

In light of these facts, it is difficult to understand how any charge that freedom of speech is about to be curtailed in the Senate can be made. All that is proposed is that obstruction in the form of a filibuster will not be allowed to prevent a vote on pending legislation in the Senate. I cannot agree with Professor Rogers, for example, "that the filibuster is no more than a modern auxiliary precaution against what one more than one-third of the Senators may consider an 'unjust combination' of the majority."

Vice President Nixon ruled in 1957 that each new Senate must have the power to determine its rules by majority vote. "Any provision of Senate rules," said the Vice President, "adopted in a previous Congress which has the express or practical effect of denying the majority of the Senate in a new Congress the right to adopt the rules under which it desires to proceed is, in the opinion of the Chair, unconstitutional."

If this view prevails, as I hope it will, in the opening days of this vital session of Congress, the Senate can adopt this reasonable proposal to place an eventual limit upon debate. While the nature of our constitutional system warrants the fullest deliberation in the enactment of laws, it never contemplated that the public business could be halted by irrelevant talkathons. The times are too critical, the needs of the Nation too great, to retain any longer an undemocratic anachronism which subjects the Senate to the scorn of world opinion and which makes a mockery of the legislative process.

Fair employment practices bill (2)	1946, 1950

[1] Thirty-six bills appear in this incomplete list, not including the many appropriation bills that have either been lost in the jam that resulted from filibusters or were talked to death because they failed to include items that particular Senators desired for the benefit of their States or because grants they made were considered excessive. Several successful filibusters have sought and achieved the enactment of legislation favored by the filibusters. Filibusters have succeeded not only in preventing the passage of legislation, but also in preventing the organization of the Senate, the election of its officers, and the confirmation of presidential appointees. They have also succeeded in modifying the terms of legislation; in delaying adjournment of Congress; in forcing special sessions, the adoption of conference reports, of neutrality legislation, and of a ship subsidy; in postponing consideration of legislation, and in raising the price of silver. Legislation has also often been defeated or modified by the mere threat of a filibuster. All the bills listed above, however, except the force bill, the armed ship resolution, and the so-called civil rights bills, were eventually enacted, in some form.

Numerous appropriation bills. For a partial list of 82 such bills failed from 1876 to 1916, see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 28, 1916, pp. 10152–10153.

Of the 36 measures listed above, all but 11 eventually became law, in some cases after compromises had been made in their provisions following the failure of cloture. The table below, prepared at the direction of Senator HAYDEN shows the later action on 35 filibustered bills.

The 36th measure (the 2d FEPC bill) was filibustered in 1950, subsequent to the table that follows.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

ADJOURNMENT TO 10 A.M. ON MONDAY NEXT

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the late distinguished Representative from Ohio, J. HARRY MCGREGOR; the late distinguished Representative from Pennsylvania, HERMAN P. EBERHARTER; and the distinguished Representative from the State of Illinois, SID SIMPSON, I move that the Senate adjourn until 10 o'clock on Monday next.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 8 o'clock and 43 minutes p.m.) the Senate, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the late Representatives MCGREGOR, EBERHARTER, and SIMPSON adjourned until Monday, January 12, 1959, at 10 o'clock a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, JANUARY 9, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

II Samuel 22: 4: I will call upon the Lord, who is worthy to be praised.

Almighty God, who art nearest when we need Thee most in these moments of prayer, may we be blessed with insight and inspiration as we seek to discharge faithfully the duties of our high vocation.

Grant that our President, our Speaker, and all the Members of this legislative body may be used by Thee in lifting and lessening the burdens and sorrows and fears which weigh so heavily on many members of the human family.

May we strive earnestly to be the messengers and mediators of hopefulness and helpfulness in bringing in that glorious day when the forces of evil shall be supplanted by the gracious and gentle spirit of the lowly Man of Galilee.

Hear us in His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, January 7, 1959, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. McGown, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

H. Con. Res. 1. Concurrent resolution that the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Friday, January 9, 1959, at 12:30 o'clock in the afternoon.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBER

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands some Members-elect have not yet taken the oath of office. If they will appear at the bar of the House the Chair will administer the oath.

Mr. TEAGUE of California appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office as a Member of the House of Representatives.

RECESS

The SPEAKER. The House will stand in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

Thereupon (at 12 o'clock and 4 minutes p.m.) the House stood in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker at 12 o'clock and 15 minutes p.m.

JOINT SESSION OF THE HOUSE AND SENATE HELD PURSUANT TO THE PROVISIONS OF HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 1 TO HEAR AN ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER of the House presided.

The Doorkeeper announced the Vice President and Members of the United States Senate who entered the Hall of the House of Representatives, the Vice President taking the chair at the right of the Speaker, and the Members of the Senate the seats reserved for them.

The SPEAKER. On the part of the House, the Chair appoints as members of the committee to escort the President of the United States into the Chamber the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. MCCORMACK; the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HALLECK; and the gentleman from Oklahoma, Mr. ALBERT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the part of the Senate, the Chair appoints as members of the committee of escort the Senator from Texas, Mr. JOHNSON; the Senator from Montana, Mr. MANSFIELD; the Senator from Illinois, Mr. DIRKSEN; and the Senator from California, Mr. KUCHEL.

The Doorkeeper announced the Ambassadors, Ministers, and Chargés d'Affaires of foreign governments.

The Ambassadors, Ministers, and Charges d'Affaires of foreign governments entered the Hall of the House of Representatives and took the seats reserved for them.

The Doorkeeper announced the Chief Justice of the United States and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court.

The Chief Justice of the United States and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court entered the Hall of the House of Representatives and took the seats reserved for them in front of the Speaker's rostrum.

The Doorkeeper announced the Cabinet of the President of the United States.

The members of the Cabinet of the President of the United States entered the Hall of the House of Representatives and took the seats reserved for them in front of the Speaker's rostrum.

At 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p.m. the Doorkeeper announced the President of the United States.

The President of the United States, escorted by the Committee of Senators and Representatives, entered the Hall of the House of Representatives and stood at the Clerk's desk. [Applause, the Members rising.]

The SPEAKER. Members of the Congress, I have the great pleasure, and I deem it a great honor to have the privilege, of presenting the President of the United States. [Applause, the Members rising.]

THE STATE OF THE UNION—ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 1)

The PRESIDENT. Thank you very much for the warmth of your welcome; and, Mr. President and Mr. Speaker, to you both a happy birthday.

Members of the 86th Congress and friends, first, I should like to assure the delegation of our newest State, Alaska, of my satisfaction that it now begins its participation with all of you in the work of Congress for the benefit of the United States. [Applause.]

May I voice the hope that before my term of office is ended I shall have the opportunity and the great satisfaction of seeing the 50th star in our national flag. [Applause.]

Members of the Congress, this is the moment when Congress and the Executive annually begin their cooperative work to build a better America.

One basic purpose unites us: To promote strength and security, side by side with liberty and opportunity.

As we meet today, in the 170th year of the Republic, our Nation must continue to provide—as, indeed, all other free governments have had to do throughout time—a satisfactory answer to a question as old as history. It is: Can government based upon liberty and the God-given rights of man, permanently endure when ceaselessly challenged by a dictatorship, hostile to our mode of life, and controlling an economic and military strength of great and growing power?

For us the answer has always been found, and is still found in the devotion, the vision, the courage, and the fortitude of our people.

Moreover, this challenge we face, not as a single powerful nation, but as one that has in recent decades reached a position of recognized leadership in the free world.

We have arrived at this position of leadership in an era of remarkable productivity and growth. It is also a time when man's power of mass destruction has reached fearful proportions.

Possession of such capabilities help create world suspicion and tension. We, on our part, know that we seek only a just peace for all, with aggressive designs against no one. Yet we realize that there is uneasiness in the world because of a belief on the part of peoples that through arrogance, miscalculation, the fear of attack, catastrophic war could be launched. Keeping the peace in today's world more than ever calls for the utmost in the Nation's resolution, wisdom, steadiness, and unremitting effort.

We cannot build peace through desire alone. Moreover, we have learned the bitter lesson that international agreements, historically considered by us as sacred, are regarded in Communist doctrine and in practice to be mere scraps of paper. The most recent proof of their disdain of international obligations, solemnly undertaken, is their announced intention to abandon their responsibilities respecting Berlin.

As a consequence of these actions, we can have no confidence in any treaty to which Communists are a party except where such a treaty provides within itself for self-enforcing mechanisms.

Indeed, the demonstrated disregard of the Communists of their own pledges is one of the greatest obstacles to world success in substituting the rule of law for rule by force.

Yet step by step we must strengthen the institutions of peace—a peace that rests upon justice—a peace that depends upon a deep knowledge and clear understanding by all peoples including our own of the consequences of failure in this great purpose.

I

To achieve this peace we seek to prevent war at any place and in any dimension. If, despite our best efforts, a local dispute should flare into armed hostilities, the next problem would be to keep the conflict from spreading, and so compromising freedom. In support of these objectives we maintain forces of great power and flexibility.

Our formidable air striking forces are a powerful deterrent to general war. Large, and growing portions of these units can depart from their bases in a matter of minutes.

Similar forces are included in our naval fleets.

Ground and other tactical formations can move with swiftness and precision, when requested by friendly and responsible governments, to help curb threatened aggression. The stabilizing influence of this capacity has been dramatically demonstrated more than once over the past year.

Our military and related scientific progress has been highly gratifying.

Great strides have been made in the development of ballistic missiles. Intermediate range missiles are now being deployed in operational units. The Atlas intercontinental ballistic missile program has been marked by rapid development as evidenced by recent successful tests. Missile training units have been established and launching sites are far along in construction.

New aircraft that fly at twice the speed of sound are entering our squadrons.

We have successfully placed five satellites in orbit, which have gathered information of scientific importance never before available. Our latest satellite illustrates our steady advance in rocketry and foreshadows new developments in worldwide communications.

Warning systems constantly improve.

Our atomic submarines have shattered endurance records and made historic voyages under the North Polar Sea.

A major segment of our national scientific and engineering community is working intensively to achieve new and greater developments. Advance in military technology requires adequate financing but, of course, even more, it requires talent and time.

All this I give only as a matter of history, as a record of our progress in space and ballistic missile fields in no more than 4 years of intensive effort. At the same time we clearly recognize that some of the recent Soviet accomplishments in this particular technology are indeed brilliant.

Under the law enacted last year the Department of Defense is being reorganized to give the Secretary of Defense full authority over the Military Establishment. Greater efficiency, more cohesive effort and speedier reaction to emergencies are among the many advantages we are already noting from these changes.

These few highlights point up our steady military gains. We are rightfully gratified by the achievements they represent. New and greater developments preoccupy the major portion of the Nation's scientists. But we must remember that these imposing armaments are purchased at great cost.

National security programs account for nearly 60 percent of the entire Federal budget for this coming fiscal year.

Modern weapons are exceedingly expensive.

The overall cost of introducing Atlas into our Armed Forces will average $35 million per missile on the firing line.

This year we are investing an aggregate of close to $7 billion in missile programs alone.

Other billions go for research, development, test and evaluation of new weapons systems.

Our latest atomic submarines will cost $50 million each, while some special types will cost three times as much.

We are now ordering fighter aircraft which are priced at 50 times as much as the fighters of World War II.

We are buying certain bombers that cost their weight in gold, exactly.

These sums are tremendous, even when compared with the marvelous resiliency and capacity of our economy.

Such expenditures demand both balance and perspective in our planning for defense. At every turn, we must weigh, judge and select. Needless duplication of weapons and forces must be avoided.

We must guard against feverish building of vast armaments to meet glibly predicted moments of so-called maximum peril. The threat we face is not sporadic or dated: It is continuous. Hence we must not be swayed in our calculations either by groundless fear or by complacency. We must avoid extremes, for vacillation between extremes is inefficient, costly, and destructive of morale. In these days of unceasing technological advance, we must plan our defense expenditures systematically and with care, fully recognizing that obsolescence compels the never-ending replacement of older weapons with new ones.

The defense budget for the coming year has been planned on the basis of these principles and considerations. Over these many months I have personally participated in its development.

The aim is a sensible posture of defense. The secondary aim is increased efficiency and avoidance of waste. Both are achieved by this budgetary plan.

Working by these guidelines I believe with all my heart that America can be as sure of the strength and efficiency of her Armed Forces as she is of their loyalty. I am equally sure that the Nation will thus avoid useless expenditures which, in the name of security, might tend to undermine the economy and, therefore, the Nation's safety.

Our own vast strength is only a part of that required for dependable security. Because of this we have joined with nearly 50 other nations in collective security arrangements. In these common undertakings each nation is expected to contribute what it can in sharing the heavy load. Each supplies part of a strategic deployment to protect the forward boundaries of freedom.

Constantly we seek new ways to make more effective our contribution to this system of collective security. Recently I have asked a committee of eminent Americans of both parties to reappraise our military assistance programs and the relative emphasis which should be placed on military and economic aid.

I am hopeful that preliminary recommendations of this committee will be available in time to assist in shaping the mutual security program for the coming fiscal year.

Any survey of the free world's defense structure cannot fail to impart a feeling of regret that so much of our effort and resources must be devoted to armaments. At Geneva and elsewhere we continue to seek technical and other agreements that may help to open up, with some promise, the issues of international disarmament. America will never give up the hope that eventually all nations can, with mutual confidence, drastically reduce these nonproductive expenditures.

II

The material foundation of our national safety is a strong and expanding economy. This we have—and this we must maintain. Only with such an economy can we be secure and simultaneously provide for the well-being of our people.

A year ago the Nation was experiencing a decline in employment and in output. Today that recession is fading into history, and this without gigantic, hastily improvised public works projects or untimely tax reductions. A healthy and vigorous recovery has been under way since last May. New homes are being built at the highest rate in several years. Retail sales are at peak levels. Personal income is at an alltime high.

The marked forward thrust of our economy reaffirms our confidence in competitive enterprise. But, clearly, wisdom and prudence in both the public and private sectors of the economy are always necessary.

The outlook is this: 1960 commitments for our Armed Forces, the Atomic Energy Commission, and military assistance, exceed $47 billion. In the foreseeable future they are not likely to be significantly lower. With an annual population increase of 3 million, other governmental costs are bound to mount.

After we have provided wisely for our military strength, we must judge how to allocate our remaining Government resources most effectively to promote our well-being and economic growth.

Federal programs that will benefit all citizens are moving forward.

Next year we will be spending increased amounts on health programs; on Federal assistance to science and education; on the development of the Nation's water resources; on the renewal of urban areas; and on our vast system of Federal-aid highways.

Each of these additional outlays is being made necessary by the surging growth of America.

Let me illustrate. Responsive to this growth, Federal grants and long-term loans to assist 14 major types of capital improvements in our cities will total over $2 billion in 1960—and this figure is double the expenditure of 2 years ago. The major responsibility for development in these fields rests in the localities, even though the Federal Government will continue to do its proper part in meeting the genuine needs of a burgeoning population.

But the progress of our economy can more than match the growth of our needs. We need only to act wisely and confidently.

Here, I hope you will permit me to digress long enough to express something that is much on my mind.

As I said in the beginning, the basic question facing us today is more than mere survival—the military defense of national life and territory. It is the preservation of a way of life.

We must meet the world challenge and at the same time permit no stagnation in America.

Unless we progress, we regress.

We can successfully sustain security and remain true to our heritage of freedom if we clearly visualize the tasks ahead and set out to perform them with resolution and vigor. We must first define these tasks and then understand what we must do to perform them.

If progress is to be steady we must have long-term guides extending far ahead, certainly 5, possibly even 10 years. They must reflect the knowledge that before the end of 5 years we will have a population of more than 190 million. They must be goals that stand high, and so inspire every citizen to climb always toward mounting levels of moral, intellectual and material strength. Every advance toward them cannot do other than serve to stir pride in individual and national achievements.

To define these goals, I intend to mobilize help from every available source.

We need more than politically ordained national objectives if we are to challenge the best efforts of free men and women. A group of selfless, able, and devoted individuals, outside of governments, could effectively participate in making the necessary appraisal of the potentials of our future.

The result would be the establishment of national goals that would not only spur us on to our finest efforts, but also would meet the stern test of practicality.

The committee I plan will comprise educators and representatives of labor, management, finance, the professions, and every other kind of useful activity.

Such a study would update and supplement, in the light of continuous changes in our society and its economy, the monumental work of the Committee on Recent Social Trends which was appointed in 1931 by President Hoover. Its report has stood the test of time and has had a beneficial influence on national development.

The new committee would be concerned, among other things, with the living standards of our people, their health and education, their better assurance of life and liberty and their greater opportunities. It would also be concerned with methods to meet such goals and what levels of government—local, State, or Federal, might or should be particularly concerned.

As one example, consider our schools, operated under the authority of local communities and States. In their capacity and in their quality they conform to no recognizable standards. In some places facilities are ample, in others meager. Pay of teachers ranges between wide limits, from the adequate to the shameful. As would be expected, quality of teaching varies just as widely. But to our teachers we commit the most valuable possession of the Nation and of the family—our children.

We must have teachers of competence. To obtain and hold them we need standards. We need a national goal. Once established I am certain that public opinion would compel steady progress toward its accomplishment.

Such studies would be helpful, I believe, to government at all levels and to all individuals. The goals so established could help us see our current problems in perspective. They will spur progress. [Applause.]

We do not forget, of course, that our Nation's progress and fiscal integrity are interdependent and inseparable. We can afford everything we clearly need, but we cannot afford one cent of waste. We must examine every item of governmental expense critically. To do otherwise would betray our Nation's future.

Thrift is one of the characteristics that have made this Nation great; why should we ignore it now? [Applause.]

We must avoid any contribution to inflationary processes, which could disrupt sound growth in our economy.

Prices have displayed a welcome stability in recent months and, if we are wise and resolute, we will not tolerate inflation in the years to come. [Applause.] But history makes clear the risks inherent in any failure to deal firmly with the basic causes of inflation. Two of the most important of these causes are the wage-price spiral and continued deficit financing.

Inflation would reduce job opportunities, price us out of world markets, shrink the value of savings and penalize the thrift so essential to finance a growing economy.

Inflation is not a Robin Hood, taking from the rich to give to the poor. Rather, it deals most cruelly with those who can least protect themselves. It strikes hardest those millions of our citizens whose incomes do not quickly rise with the cost of living. When prices soar, the pensioner and the widow see their security undermined, the man of thrift sees his savings melt away; the white collar worker, the minister, and the teacher see their standards of living dragged down.

Inflation can be prevented. But this demands statesmanship on the part of business and labor leaders and of government at all levels.

We must encourage the self-discipline, the restraint necessary to curb the wage-price spiral and except only in critical emergencies we must meet current costs from current revenue. [Applause.]

To minimize the danger of future soaring prices and to keep our economy sound and expanding, I shall present to the Congress certain proposals.

First, I shall submit a balanced budget for the next year [applause], a year expected to be the most prosperous in our entire history. It is a realistic budget with wholly attainable objectives.

If we cannot live within our means during such a time of rising prosperity, the hope for fiscal integrity will fade; and if we persist in living beyond our means we make it difficult for every family in our land to balance its own household budget. [Applause.] But to live within our means would be a tangible demonstration to ourselves and to others of the self-discipline needed to assure a stable dollar.

The Constitution entrusts the Executive with many functions, but the Congress—and the Congress alone—has the power of the purse. Ultimately upon Congress rests responsibility for determining the scope and amount of Federal spending.

By working togther, the Congress and the Executive can keep a balance between income and outgo. If this is done there is real hope that we can look forward to a time in the foreseeable future when needed tax reforms can be accomplished.

In this hope, I am requesting the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare appropriate proposals for revising, at the proper time, our tax structure, to remove inequities and to enhance incentives for all Americans to work, to save, and to invest. [Applause.] Such recommendations will be made as quickly as our fiscal condition permits. These prospects will be brightened if 1960 expenditures do not exceed the levels recommended.

Second, I shall recommend to the Congress that the Chief Executive be given the responsibility either to approve or to veto specific items of appropriations and authorization bills. I assure you gentlemen that I know this recommendation has been made time and again by every President that has appeared in this hall for many years, but I say this, it still is one of the most important corrections that could be made in our annual expenditure program, because this would save tax dollars. [Applause.]

Third, to reduce Federal operations in an area where private enterprise can do the job, I shall recommend legislation for greater flexibility in extending Federal credit, and in improving the procedures under which private credits are insured or guaranteed. [Applause.] Present practices have needlessly added large sums to Federal expenditures.

Fourth, action is required to make more effective use of the large Federal expenditures for agriculture and to achieve greater fiscal control in this area.

Outlays of the Department of Agriculture for the current fiscal year for the support of farm prices on a very few farm products will exceed $5 billion. That is a sum equal to approximately two-fifths of the net income of all farm operators in the entire United States.

By the end of this fiscal year it is estimated that there will be in Government hands surplus farm products worth about $9 billion. And by July 1, 1959, Government expenditures for storage, interest, and handling of its agricultural inventory will reach a rate of $1 billion a year.

This level of expenditure for farm products could be made willingly for a temporary period if it were leading to a sound solution of the problem. But unfortunately this is not true. We need new legislation.

In the past I have sent messages to the Congress requesting greater freedom for our farmers to manage their own farms and greater freedom for markets to reflect the wishes of producers and consumers. Legislative changes that followed were appropriate in direction but did not go far enough.

The situation calls for prompt and forthright action. Recommendation for action will be contained in a message to be transmitted to the Congress shortly.

These fiscal and related actions will help create an environment of price stability for economic growth. However, certain additional measures are needed.

I shall ask Congress to amend the Employment Act of 1946 to make it clear that Government intends to use all appropriate means to protect the buying power of the dollar. [Applause.]

I am establishing a continuing Cabinet group on price stability for economic growth to study governmental and private policies affecting costs, prices, and economic growth. It will strive also to build a better public understanding of the conditions necessary for maintaining growth and price stability.

Studies are being undertaken to improve our information on prices, wages, and productivity.

I believe all citizens in all walks of life will support this program of action to accelerate economic growth and promote price stability.

III

I take up next certain aspects of our international situation and our progress to strengthen it.

America's security can be assured only within a world community of strong, stable, independent nations, in which the concepts of freedom, justice, and human dignity can flourish.

There can be no such thing as Fortress America. If ever we were reduced to the isolation implied by that term, we would occupy a prison, not a fortress. The question whether we can afford to help other nations that want to defend their freedom but cannot fully do so from their own means, has only one answer: we can and we must, as we have been doing so since 1947.

Our foreign policy has long been dedicated to building a permanent and just peace.

During the past 6 years our free world security arrangements have been bolstered and the bonds of freedom have been more closely knit. Our friends in Western Europe are experiencing new internal vitality, and are increasingly more able to resist external threats.

Over the years the world has come to understand clearly that it is our firm policy not to countenance aggression. In Lebanon, Taiwan, and Berlin—our stand has been clear, right, and expressive of the determined will of a united people. [Applause.]

Acting with other free nations we have undertaken the solemn obligation to defend the people of free Berlin against any effort to destroy their freedom. [Applause.] In the meantime we shall constantly seek meaningful agreements to settle this and other problems, knowing full well that not only the integrity of a single city, but the hope of all free peoples is at stake. [Applause.]

We need, likewise, to continue helping to build the economic base so essential to the free world's stability and strength.

The International Monetary Fund and the World Bank have both fully proven their worth as instruments of international financial cooperation. Their executive directors have recommended an increase in each member country's subscription. I am requesting the Congress for immediate approval of our share of these increases.

We are now negotiating with representatives of the 20 Latin American Republics for the creation of an inter-American financial institution. Its purpose would be to join all the American Republics in a common institution which would promote and finance development in Latin America. [Applause.] One great result of this would be to make more effective use of capital from the World Bank, the Export-Import Bank, and private sources.

Private enterprise continues to make major contributions to economic development in all parts of the world. But we have not yet marshaled the full potential of American business for this task, particularly in countries which have recently attained their independence. I shall present to this Congress a program designed to encourage greater participation by private enterprise in economic development abroad. [Applause.]

Further, all of us know that to advance the cause of freedom we must do much more than help build sound economies. The spiritual, intellectual, and physical strength of people throughout the world will in the last analysis determine their willingness and their ability to resist communism.

To give a single illustration of our many efforts in these fields: We have been a participant in the effort that has been made over the past few years against one of the great scourges of mankind—disease. Through the mutual security program public health officials are being trained by American universities to serve in less developed countries. We are engaged in intensive malaria eradication projects in many parts of the world in this work. America's major successes in our own country prove the feasibility of success everywhere.

By these and other means we shall continue and expand our campaign against the afflictions that now bring needless suffering and death to so many of the world's people. We wish to be part of a great shared effort toward the triumph of health. [Applause.]

I think most of us would agree that America is best described by one word, "freedom."

If we hope to strengthen freedom in the world we must be ever mindful of how our own conduct reacts elsewhere. No nation has ever been so floodlighted by world opinion as the United States is today. Everything we do is carefully scrutinized by other peoples throughout the world. The bad is seen along with the good.

Because we are human we err. But as free men we are also responsible for correcting the errors and imperfections of our ways.

Last January I made comprehensive recommendations to the Congress for legislation in the labor-management field. To my disappointment, Congress failed to act. The McClellan committee disclosures of corruption, racketeering, and abuse of trust and power in labor-management affairs have aroused America and amazed other peoples. [Applause.] Its disclosures emphasize the need for improved local law enforcement and the enactment of effective Federal legislation to protect the public interest and to insure the rights and economic freedoms of millions of American workers. Halfhearted measures will not do. [Applause.] I shall recommend prompt enactment of legislation designed:

To safeguard workers' funds in union treasuries against misuse of any kind whatsoever.

To protect the rights and freedoms of individual union members, including the basic right to free and secret elections of officers. [Applause.]

To advance true and responsible collective bargaining.

To protect the public and innocent third parties from unfair and coercive practices such as boycotting and blackmail picketing. [Applause.]

The workers and the public must have these vital protections.

In other areas of human rights—freedom from discrimination in voting, in public education, in access to jobs, and in other respects—the world is likewise watching our conduct.

The image of America abroad is not improved when schoolchildren, through closing of some of our schools and through no fault of their own, are deprived of their opportunity for an education. [Applause.]

The government of a free people has no purpose more noble than to work for the maximum realization of equality of opportunity under law. That is the concept under which our founding papers were written. This is not the sole responsibility of any one branch of our government. The judicial arm, which has the ultimate authority for interpreting the Constitution, has held that certain State laws and practices discriminate upon racial grounds and are unconstitutional. Whenever the supremacy of the Constitution of the United States is challenged I shall continue to take every proper action necessary to uphold it. [Applause.]

One of the fundamental concepts of our constitutional system is that it guarantees to every individual, regardless of race, religion, or national origin, the equal protection of the laws. Those of us who are privileged to hold public office have a solemn obligation to make meaningful this inspiring objective. We can fulfill that obligation by our leadership in teaching, persuading, demonstrating, and in enforcing the law.

We are now making noticeable progress in the field of civil rights—we are moving forward toward achievements of equality of opportunity for all people everywhere in the United States. In the interest of the Nation and of each of its citizens, that progress must continue.

Legislative proposals of the administration in this field will be submitted to the Congress early in the session. All of us should help to make clear that the Government is united in the common purpose of giving support to the law and the decisions of the courts. [Applause.]

Finally, by moving steadily toward the goal of greater freedom under law, for our own people, we shall be the better prepared to work for the cause of freedom under law throughout the world.

All peoples are sorely tired of the fear, destruction, and the waste of war. As never before, the world knows the human and material costs of war and seeks to replace force with a genuine rule of law among nations.

It is my purpose to intensify efforts during the coming 2 years in seeking ways to supplement the procedures of the United Nations and other bodies with similar objectives, to the end that the rule of law may replace the rule of force in the affairs of nations. Measures toward this end will be proposed later, including a reexamination of our own relation to the International Court of Justice.

And lastly, let us remind ourselves that Marxist scripture is not new; it is not the gospel of the future. Its basic objective is dictatorship, old as history. What is new is the shining prospect that man can build a world where all can live in dignity.

We seek victory not over any nation or people but over the ancient enemies of us all; victory over ignorance, poverty, disease, and human degradation wherever they may be found.

We march in the noblest of causes—human freedom.

If we make ourselves worthy of America's ideals, if we do not forget that our Nation was founded on the premise that all men are creatures of God's making, the world will come to know that it is free men who carry forward the true promise of human progress and dignity.

I thank you very much. [Applause, the Members rising.]

At 1 o'clock and 15 minutes p.m. the President, accompanied by the committee of escort, retired from the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The Doorkeeper escorted the invited guests from the Chamber in the following order:

The Ambassadors, Ministers, and Chargés d'Affaires of foreign governments.

The Chief Justice of the United States and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court.

The members of the President's Cabinet.

JOINT SESSION DISSOLVED

The SPEAKER. The Chair declares the joint session of the two Houses now dissolved.

Thereupon (at 1 o'clock and 20 minutes p.m.) the joint session of the two Houses was dissolved.

The Members of the Senate retired to their Chamber.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE REFERRED TO THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE HOUSE AND ORDERED PRINTED

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message of the President be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union and ordered printed.

The motion was agreed to.

RECESS

The SPEAKER. The House will stand in recess until 2 o'clock p.m.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 21 minutes p.m.) the House stood in recess until 2 o'clock p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker at 2 o'clock p.m.

OATH OF OFFICE ADMINISTERED TO HON. DANIEL A. REED

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with your designation of me, pursuant to House Resolution 12, 86th Congress, adopted by the House of Representatives; to administer the oath of office to Representative-elect DANIEL A. REED, of the 43d District of New York, I have the honor to report that on Wednesday, January 7, 1959, at Washington, D.C., I administered the oath of office to Mr. REED, form prescribed by section 1757 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, being the form of oath administered to Members of the House of Representatives, to which Mr. REED subscribed.

Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 66) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas DANIEL A. REED, a Representative from the State of New York, from the 43d District thereof, has been unable from sickness to appear in person to be sworn as a Member of this House, but has sworn to and subscribed to the oath of office before the Honorable JOHN TABER, authorized by resolution of this House to administer the oath, and the said oath of office has been presented in his behalf to the House, and there being no contest or question as to his election: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the said oath be accepted and received by the House as the oath of office of the said DANIEL A. REED as a Member of this House.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT TO HOUSE RESOLUTION 8

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 67) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

That House Resolution 8, 86th Congress, is amended as follows:

(1) In line 2, strike out the word "six" and insert "five" in lieu thereof; and

(2) In line 3, strike out "January 7, 1959" and insert "January 3, 1959" in lieu thereof.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. JOHN WILLIAM POWELL, SYLVIA CAMPBELL POWELL, AND JULIAN SCHUMAN

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

JANUARY 7, 1959.

The Honorable the SPEAKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: From the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California, Southern Division, I have received a subpena duces tecum, directed to me as clerk of the Committee on Appropriations to appear before said court as a witness in the case of the United States of America v. John William Powell, Sylvia Campbell Powell, and Julian Schuman, defendants, and to bring with me certain and sundry papers therein described from the files of the House of Representatives. The original return date of September 22, 1958, has been postponed to January 28, 1959.

The rules and practice of the House of Representatives indicate that the clerk of a committee may not, either voluntarily or in obedience to a subpena duces tecum, produce such papers without the consent of the House being first obtained. It is further indicated that such clerk may not supply copies of certain of the documents and papers requested without such consent.

The subpena in question is herewith attached, and the matter is presented for such action as the House in its wisdom may see fit to take.

Very truly yours,

KENNETH SPRANKLE,
Clerk and Staff Director, Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the subpena.

The Clerk read as follows:

U.S. DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA, SOUTHERN DIVISION—UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. JOHN WILLIAM POWELL, SYLVIA CAMPBELL POWELL, AND JULIAN SCHUMAN

TO CLERK, COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

You are hereby commanded to appear in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California at U.S. Post Office Building, 7th and Mission Streets, in the city of San Francisco on the 22d day of September 1958 at 10 o'clock a.m. to testify in the case of United States v. Powell et al., and bring with you the documents, books, papers, records, and files identified and described on the list attached hereto.

This subpena is issued upon application of the defendants.

C. W. CALBREATH,
Clerk.

By WILLIAM J. FLINN,
Deputy Clerk.

JUNE 24, 1958.

DORIS BRIN WALKER, ESQ.,
Attorney for Defendants.

CASE OF UNITED STATES AGAINST JOHN P. GILBOY, JR., ET AL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House:

JANUARY 8, 1959.

The Honorable the SPEAKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: From the District Court of the United States for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, I have received a subpena duces tecum, directed to me as Clerk of the House of Representatives, to appear before said court as a witness in the case of the United States v. John P. Gilboy, Jr., et al. (No. 12880, criminal), and to bring certified copies of signed oaths of office executed by Congressman WILLIAM J. GREEN, Jr., for the 81st, 82d, 83d, 84th, and 85th Congresses, with certified copies of extracts of the Journal of the House of Representatives showing that Congressman GREEN was a member of the Armed Services Committee of the House of Representatives during the 81st, 82d, 83d, 84th, and 85th Congresses.

The subpena in question is herewith enclosed, and the matter is presented for such action as the House in its wisdom may see fit to take.

Very truly yours,

RALPH R. ROBERTS,
Clerk, U.S. House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the subpena.

The Clerk read as follows:

U.S. DISTRICT COURT FOR THE MIDDLE DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA—UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. JOHN P. GILBOY, JR., ET AL.—NO. 12880 CRIMINAL

TO RALPH R. ROBERTS,
Clerk, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

You are herby commanded to appear in the U.S. District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania at 307 Post Office Building in the city of Lewisburg, Pa. on the 13th day of January 1959 at 2 o'clock p.m. to testify in the case of United States v. John P. Gilboy, Jr., et al., and bring with you certified copies of signed oaths of office executed by Congressman WILLIAM J. GREEN, JR., for the 81st, 82d, 83d, 84th and 85th Congresses, with certified copies of extracts of the Journal of the House of Representatives showing that Congressman GREEN was a member of the Armed Services Committee of the House of Representatives during the 81st, 82d, 83d, 84th and 85th Congresses.

This subpena is issued upon application of the United States.

T. H. CAMPION,
Clerk.

OLIVER DIBBLE,
Special Assistant to the Attorney General, Attorney for United States.

DECEMBER 18, 1958.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 68) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas in the case of the United States v. John P. Gilboy, Jr., et al. (criminal case No. 12880), pending in the U.S. District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, a subpena duces tecum was issued by the said court and addressed to Ralph R. Roberts, Clerk of the House of Representatives, directing him to appear as a witness before the said court on the 13th day of January 1959, at 2 p.m. and to bring with him certain and sundry papers in the possession and under the control of the House of Representatives: Therefore be it

Resolved, That by the privileges of this House no evidence of a documentary character under the control and in the possession of the House of Representatives can, by the mandate of process of the ordinary courts of justice, be taken from such control or possession but by its permission; be it further

Resolved, That when it appears by the order of the court or of the judge thereof, or of any legal officer charged with the administration of the orders of such court or judge, that documentary evidence in the possession and under the control of the House is needful for use in any court of justice, or before any judge or such legal officer, for the promotion of justice, this House will take such order thereon as will promote the ends of justice consistently with the privileges and rights of this House; be it further

Resolved, That Ralph R. Roberts, Clerk of the House, be authorized to appear at the place and before the court named in the subpena duces tecum before mentioned, but shall not take with him any papers or documents on file in his office or under his control or in possession of the Clerk of the House; be it further

Resolved, That when said court determines upon the materiality and the relevancy of the papers and documents called for in the subpena duces tecum, then the said court, through any of its officers or agents, have full permission to attend with all proper parties to the proceeding and then always at any place under the orders and control of this House and take copies of any documents or papers and the Clerk is authorized to supply certified copies of such documents and papers in possession or control of said Clerk that the court has found to be material and relevant, except minutes and transcripts of executive sessions, and any evidence of witnesses in respect thereto which the court or other proper officer thereof shall desire, so as, however, the possession of said documents and papers by the said Clerk shall not be disturbed or the same shall not be removed from their place of file or custody under said Clerk; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the said court as a respectful answer to the subpena aforementioned.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY NEXT

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

OUR RELATIONS WITH LATIN AMERICA

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, in announcing to the House the introduction by me of a resolution creating a select committee to conduct a sweeping investigation of all aspects of our relations with Latin America I wish to stress its importance to the people and the interests of the great Middle West and to Chicago.

It goes without saying that we cannot live safely in a world of discord if there is not existent among the nations and the peoples of our own hemisphere the greatest possible measure of understanding and of accord. We cannot hope to make felt our influence among the peoples of other hemispheres if on our own hemisphere there does not exist in the hearts and the minds of all the people in all our hemispheric neighbors an understanding of us and a sincere desire to cooperate with us in the attainment of the ideals to which we hold.

But today in these brief remarks it is my purpose to stress the especial interest of the great Middle West and of Chicago, second city in population of our country and now dynamically driving forward to the attainment of its destiny as the first inland ocean port of the world.

Our trade with Latin America is larger than with any other single area in all the world. Close to one-third of all our imports come from Latin America and about one-fourth of all our exports go to that area. In 1 year we exported to Latin America products that totaled in value $4.7 billion. Let me repeat that in 1 year we find a market for our exports in the countries of Latin America that reach a total in money value of $4.7 billion. I need not say that the loss or serious weakening of such a market would have serious repercussion upon our economy.

The Latin American countries in turn depend upon us as the major market for their exports. They find in the United States a market for more than three-fourths of their copper, two-thirds of their coffee, one-half of their raw wool, and three-fifths of their petroleum.

Our stake in the attainment of a real hemispheric solidarity through the dissolvement of existing differences in the working out of a program mutually advantageous is tremendously large. So too is the stake of our Latin American neighbors.

I feel strongly that this body should not leave largely this problem to the attention of the other body. We are not going to survive and fulfill our national destiny in the attainment of a better world for everyone in it unless our best friends, the friends who understand us and work with us, are our neighbors on this hemisphere. The creation by this body of a select committee especially delegated and with dedication to this task would in itself go far in the assurance to our Latin American neighbors of our interest and the sincerity of our purpose. This select committee properly should be composed of members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and should be under the guiding influences of the great chairman of that committee, and the resolution which I have offered so provides.

But unless it is a select committee, provided with the authorization necessary and an adequate staff, it would be most difficult to do the thorough job that is required.

I have said that Chicago has a transcending interest in the development of our trade and the strengthening of our ties with Latin America. Under the dynamic leadership of Mayor Richard J. Daley, Chicago, in connection with the Pan American games, is planning the most pretentious series of events in the history of this hemisphere to bring together our people with the peoples of Latin America and to interweave our cultures. It is a program of tremendous import.

Mayor Daley time and again has pointed out that with the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway and the development of the Cal-Sag inland waterway from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico a new and dazzling era is opening for our country and for the ever expanding contribution of the Middle West to the future of our country.

The greatest percent of our industrial products are produced in the Midwest and much of the agricultural exports are either grown or processed in this region. Because of our position as a major transportation center, much of the commodities exported are either shipped through the area to coastal ports or transferred directly to overseas carriers operating in the Great Lakes. More than one-fifth of all truck sales are made to overseas customers, over one-quarter of the tractors produced in the United States are exported, and foreign purchases of other farm machinery represent 13 percent of the overall demand. Shipments abroad of construction equipment total 26 percent of total production, and overseas sales take 11 percent of the output of machine tools.

In all of these industries, Midwest firms predominate. Foreign purchases of United States fats and oils totaled $600 million in 1 year, largely soybean oil and animal fats. Over 50 percent of the U.S. soybeans are grown in Illinois, Indiana, and Iowa; and Middle West farms and meatpacking plants are important sources of animal fats.

The United States and in an especially large measure the Middle West cannot afford to have our large and profitable hemispheric trade threatened nor can we afford to have any hemispheric problems that through inattention may grow in their irritation and come to divide the peoples of our hemisphere who in their own interest should understand one another and should work together in cooperation to the advantage of all.

Mr. Speaker, we in Chicago and in the Middle West are vitally interested. The interest of other sections of our beloved country cannot be less than our own interest. The strengthening of our ties with the nations and the peoples of Latin America presents a challenge to the 86th Congress that we must accept and discharge its responsibility with thoroughness and in the spirit of dedication. I trust that the leadership and the House will react favorably to the creation of a select committee appointed from the membership of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and from this will come an hemispheric harmony, a unity in working together, for which long we have reached and never quite have attained.

COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and to include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, as part of the "Operation Abolition" that we all know has been going on for some time in connection with the work of the Committee on Un-American Activities, there appeared in the Washington Post of January 7, 1959, an advertisement which I think has hit a new low with respect to deceit practiced in the attempt to divide our people. This advertisement states that the committee has "harassed Americans who work for racial equality and justice." It states that it has "increased the bitterness between racial and religious groups of our citizens."

Now I call upon any of the people whose names are attached to that advertisement to state wherein this committee has ever done anything that even resembles remotely the things that have been charged in this advertisement. In that connection, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks the backgrounds of the signers or the majority of the signers, of this advertisement.

These people are for the most part well-known fellow travelers or members of Communist fronts, many of whom were active not too long ago in "the committee to secure justice" for the Rosenbergs. With our eyes wide open, I am sure that this advertisement will be given its proper place.

The advertisement referred to is as follows:

"The Un-American Activities Committee should be abolished, not reorganized and expanded." (Editorial, the Washington Post, Dec. 19, 1958.)

We, the undersigned, petition the 86th Congress to eliminate the House Committee on Un-American Activities as a standing committee.

We believe that the U.S. Supreme Court has, in the United States v. Watkins, made it clear that the committee has habitually misused its mandate in unconstitutional ways for political purposes; that it has become an agency for repression; that it has usurped the functions of the executive and judicial branches of our Government.

We are confident that only a return to constitutional procedures can protect us against subversion without at the same time subverting the very liberties we seek to protect.

For two decades the Congress has allowed the committee to function. For 2 decades the committee has condemned individual Americans, has wrecked the lives of some, and has denied them the due process of law that English and American courts have toilsomely evolved over many centuries. Now the Nation is reaping the bitter harvest:

1. The committee has perverted and thereby imperiled, the proper and necessary powers of the Congress to conduct investigations.

2. The committee has helped discourage free study and inquiry in working for peace while the world is threatened with destruction.

3. It has harassed Americans who work for racial equality and justice.

4. In has increased bitterness between racial and religious groups of our citizens, which in turn has imperiled our good relations with the people of Asia, Africa, and Latin America.

5. It has discouraged social and cultural contacts with our neighbors on this shrinking planet. It has discouraged U.S. students and scholars from studying in countries which we Americans desperately need to understand.

The House Committee on Un-American Activities has in these ways weakened America. At no time in history have we needed to be stronger. At no time have we needed to be wiser. Let us rid ourselves of this agent of weakness and of folly.

The records of some of the signers of this advertisement are as follows:

Stringfellow Barr, a sponsor of Communist fronts, who opposed the Internal Security Act but condemned the Supreme Court conviction of the first string Communist leaders.

John M. Coe, in 1950, attorney for the Communist Party of Alabama. Has sponsored Communist fronts over a number of years.

Ray Gibbons, supported the Communist opposition to our aid to England and France during Hitler-Stalin pact in 1941.

Fowler Harper, member of National Committee Emergency Civil Liberties Committee which is leading the drive against the committee and which was cited by the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee. In 1941 Harper defended the Communist Party in a statement to the President of the United States.

James Imbrie, supporter of Communist fronts over many years including the National Committee To Secure Justice for the Rosenbergs. Member of National Committee of Emergency Civil Liberties Committee.

Erich Kahler, supporter of Communist program of American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born. Member of National Committee of Emergency Civil Liberties Committee.

Robert W. Kenny, former president of Communist-controlled National Lawyers Guild. Sponsor of numerous Communist fronts, including National Committee To Secure Justice for the Rosenbergs, Member of National Committee of Emergency Civil Liberties Committee.

John A. MacKay, sponsor of Communist fronts such as the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship.

Daniel G. Marshall, former president of Los Angeles National Law Guild. Sponsor of Communist fronts such as National Committee To Secure Justice for the Rosenbergs.

Dorothy M. Marshall, supporter of many Communist fronts including the West Coast Communist newspapers the Peoples World. Defender of the Rosenbergs, she is a member of the National Committee of Emergency Civil Liberties Committee.

Prof. Alex. Meiklejohn. Not only has he affiliated himself with Communist-front organizations he has denounced the Court for their conviction of the top Communist leadership. He has been one of the most vocal leaders of the campaign of the Emergency Civil Liberties Committee to abolish the committee.

Erv. A. J. Musti, a pacifist, he has lent his name to certain Communist organizations over the last 25 years. As chairman of the recently formed American Forum for Socialist Education he refused to answer questions about the part Communists or the Communist Party played in its formation.

Dr. Reinhold Niebuhr, a supporter of Communist fronts such as the American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born prior to World War II. He has denounced the Communist Party of the United States in recent years, while at the same time seeking the release from prison of Communists convicted under the Smith Act.

Justine Wise Polier, a onetime member of the Communist-controlled National Lawyers Guild.

Clarence C. Pickett has affiliated with Communist-front organizations over a number of years.

Ben Shahn has sponsored organizations such as the American Continental Congress for World Peace which was held in Mexico City in 1949. This Congress was designed to support the Soviet foreign policy and condemn America's. An artist, he has contributed his works for use by the Communist Party in its publications.

Paul Tillett, a supporter of the Emergency Civil Liberties Committee which has led the Communist campaign to abolish the committee.

Aubrey Williams, a supporter of Communist fronts who refused to answer questions when questioned by a Senate committee.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I read the ad and gave quite a little consideration to the individuals who sponsored it.

Remembering what the Saviour said when crucified. Should not His words be here repeated. He said "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do."

Mr. WALTER. Well, it is indeed unfortunate that some people have been unwilling dupes of this group which in order to destroy a committee of the House has now set out to raise some money. The potential contributors had better realize what movement they would be financing.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER] has expired.

CURB SCHOOL AND CHURCH BOMBING

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced a group of seven bills which would empower the Federal Government to deal with crimes of violence such as hate bombings where they are the result of an interstate conspiracy and to ban such hate mail which directly incites to violence. I believe that this comprehensive legislation will help to more effectively curb the activities of fanatics and racists trying to establish a reign of terror, particularly in communities where official resistance to court orders on desegregation of the public schools tend to invite other acts of lawlessness. In my opinion, these bills will achieve that objective without infringing upon our traditional freedoms of speech and press or the essential responsibilities and jurisdiction of local law-enforcement officials.

These bills comprise the following proposals:

First. A bill to make interstate transportation of explosives a crime when the intent is to damage or destroy any building for the purpose of interfering with its use or to intimidate any person.

Second. An amendment to the fugitive felon statute, 18 U.S.C. 1073, which forbids travel across State lines to avoid prosecution or imprisonment, to include among the crimes of violence listed the "willful destruction of any building or structure."

Third. A bill to extend to Federal officials protection against threats and violence.

Fourth. A bill to ban from the mails material tending to incite specific acts of violence such as murder, arson, assault, rape, and willful destruction of any building or structure, and so forth, listed in the fugitive felon statute, as amended.

Fifth. An amendment to the postal laws, 39 U.S.C. 259, to give the Postmaster General the authority to enforce provisions banning such mail.

Sixth. An amendment to the interstate threats statute, 18 U.S.C. 875, to ban such threats where their purpose is to interfere with Federal or State laws or decrees.

Seventh. A similar amendment to the mail threats statute, 18 U.S.C. 876, to bar such threats.

Three of these proposals would broaden the scope of existing statutes to bar hate propagandists from using the mails to make threats intended to interfere with existing laws or court orders, or for the purpose of inciting crimes of violence including unlawful destruction or damage to any building.

Hate mail has become an increasingly serious problem. The Post Office Department reports that complaints about it quadrupled in 1958. Officers who arrested the Atlanta Temple bombing suspects reported finding large supplies of anti-Semitic and anti-Negro literature in their homes. Mass mailings of this kind of material which tries to exploit bigotry, lawlessness, and discrimination have reportedly closely preceded some of the recent bombings. It is becoming increasingly difficult to separate the propaganda of hate from the actual terror, the bombings and the threats to determine which comes first.

There is no doubt in my mind that the average citizen in the South is as deeply shocked and outraged by the nearly 70 bombings and attempted bombings reported since 1954, including 27 incidents last year, as is the Nation as a whole. There is considerable support among southern officials for a law such as I now propose to give the FBI concurrent jurisdiction in hate bombing cases so that it can act immediately, just as it does now in kidnapings as authorized by the Lindbergh Act. Although these law enforcement officials are doing their utmost to catch the hate bombers, many of them feel that lack of jurisdiction and resources severely limit their ability to track down and bring to justice what their evidence indicates is probably a well-organized gang or gangs of hate terrorists operating in several States. Florida officials in particular forecast that a Federal antibombing statute would not be the signal for the slackening off in local police efforts but would instead initiate the kind of coordinated action by Federal, State, and city authorities most apt to result in the most effective police work. In the one instance where the FBI did move in at once, after the bombing of a temple in Atlanta last October, a group of suspects were speedily rounded up and indicted for the crimes.

Seldom have I examined an emergency situation which so urgently requires Federal legislation to help remedy it. Local law enforcement agencies have for the most part been unable to apprehend or convict the hate bombers or check the flood of hate mail inciting to violence which together have created a climate of severe tension in certain communities.

The dimensions of the damage wrought by the dynamiting of private homes, schools, houses of worship, community centers and places of business in several States take us beyond an obvious attempt at mass intimidation of minority groups. The terrorists responsible are assaulting a doctrine essential to the preservation of our democratic society, the maintenance of law and order to which the overwhelming majority of Americans, regardless of individual differences on civil rights, are genuinely devoted.

THE LATE HONORABLE JAMES MICHAEL CURLEY

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, James Michael Curley passed away in November 1958, after a long and colorful career as Congressman, mayor of Boston, and Governor of Massachusetts.

He was the "grand old man" of Bay State politics. The thousands who knew him personally always greeted him as "Governor" whenever they met him. And they will chuckle with affectionate remembrance of the life and times of Jim Curley.

In his youth he was a handsome son of Irish parents, with a commanding presence, and a voice that even fascinated his opponents.

He led the Democratic Party in Massachusetts from its decades of minority status, to equality, and then to its present control of government both in the State House and in the larger communities of the Commonwealth because he spoke for the common people and their bread-and-butter problems.

With his vast experience in government and his skill in human relations, he was more than a match for any powerful individual or any group that stood in the way of progress. At the same time he was one of the most charitable of men toward those who were in need. He not only gave of himself, but gave most of his worldly goods to the poor and the unfortunate.

The thousands of people from all walks of life who passed, hour after hour through the Hall of Flags in the State House to pay their last respects to an old friend was an unforgettable sight more eloquent than the statistics of the political battles that he won and lost.

How different from the cautious public administrators who would have government do as little as possible, without heart or vision or will.

Jim Curley was one of the last of the individualists in the art and science of government who may have been inefficient at times, but were rich in the human values that inspired public confidence and affection.

In this age of electronic brains and bureaucracy, people will miss men like Jim Curley.

Many a humble person kneeling by his bier paid him the greatest tribute of all as they whispered: "God bless you, Governor."

Already, his name is a legend.

As we approach the strange future, and the new social order that will evolve in response to scientific progress, many of us will think of him; of his generous heart, his sense of humor, and his profound faith in God and in the potentialities of the average man.

And thinking of Jim Curley will help us to build a world in which human beings will be the most important facts of all.

LEGISLATION ON LESS-THAN-HONORABLE DISCHARGES

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, I want to advise the membership that on Wednesday, the first day of this 86th Congress, I filed again the bill dealing with less-than-honorable discharges which bill 226 Members of this House were good enough to vote for near the close of the last session, with only 8 negative votes. I invite all of you Members to again join in passing this bill through the House at the earliest possible date. I cordially invite you to take the bill and make it yours. It is H.R. 88, and will be available in the next day or two at the House document room under H.R. 88.

We are going to try to get it through the House again as promptly as possible so that it will be sent over to the Senate in time to be considered by that body.

It has again been referred to the House Armed Services Committee of which I am a member and the distinguished chairman of which did in the last session appoint a special hearing committee to hold public hearings and to make report back to the full Armed Services Committee. This full Armed Services Committee approved the bill. It came to the House late in the session and, as I say, passed the House with a great majority of 226 aye votes and only 8 nay votes. About 30 Members of the House joined in the last session and gave weight to the merit of said bill by filing separate bills under their own authorship. I invite you to do the same thing again.

There is only one material change in the text of H.R. 88 different from the text of H.R. 8772. The change is this, to wit: Whereas in H.R. 8772 of the 85th Congress the committee recommended and the House approved the bill with the proviso therein that the document which the applicants would receive if the military review board approved their application would be called a "general discharge limited." However, last session the military strenuously opposed the use of this term, to wit, "general discharge limited," and upon further review and consideration it is believed that the term "exemplary rehabilitation certificate" is probably a more accurate and fitting name for the document which the bill proposes be given the lad who had received some type of less-than-honorable discharge but who had in fact made benefit of exemplary conduct and rehabilitation status for at least 3 years after being discharged from the military with some type of less-than-honorable discharge. Otherwise, the bill H.R. 88 is the same as H.R. 8772 of the 85th Congress. Therefore, H.R. 88 provides that the boards for correction of military records and boards of review will be authorized to correct military records or military discharges taking into consideration, in each case, the reasons for the type of original discharge and the dismissal, including, but not limited to, the following: First, the conditions that prevailed at the time of the incident, statement, attitude, or act which led to the original discharge or dismissal; second, the age of the individual at the time of the incident, statement, attitude, or act which led to the original discharge or dismissal; third, the normal punishment that might have been adjudged had the act or incident been committed in civilian life; and fourth, the moral turpitude, if any, involved in the incident, statement, attitude, or act which led to the discharge or dismissal.

In addition to changing a discharge said board having the sole and exclusive jurisdiction in the premises and it being optional with the said military board, said boards under H.R. 88 will be authorized to issue an exemplary rehabilitation certificate instead of a general discharge limited. H.R. 88 contains all the same basic provisions which were in H.R. 8772, such as not granting to applicant any government benefits as a result of change in type of discharge or being issued the exemplary rehabilitation certificate. But the boards will be able to review all types of discharges, including those issued pursuant to the general court-martial. As you know, under existing law, the boards of review may not review dismissals or discharges issued by reason of the sentence of a general court-martial.

You will be encouraged to know that Hon. CARL VINSON, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, suggested I file H.R. 88 promptly in this 86th Congress and bring it before the full Armed Services Committee to which it was referred at the earliest possible date and then to process it further through the House as promptly as possible so that it would logically arrive before the Senate Armed Services Committee promptly and in due time for it to be considered by said committee. It arrived before said Senate Committee too late to be duly considered for movement to the floor of the Senate. It is suggested as likely there will not be need of repeated public hearings in view of the extended hearings last session and the fact that the hearings were printed and available for distribution.

THE HONORABLE JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it is my desire to pay brief tribute to a former Republican leader and Speaker of the House. It was my privilege to serve under Bert Snell, of New York, under Joseph W. Byrns, William Bankhead, and our present Speaker, all of whom gave us perfect service, as well as when our colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] was Speaker of the House in the 80th and 83d Congresses.

In my judgment, every Republican, as well as every Democrat, is under obligation to our former Speaker [Mr. MARTIN]; Democrats because of the exceptional consideration given them; Republicans because of his effective efforts in behalf of our party. Because I am brief at this time does not mean I am saying even a small fraction of what might truthfully be said.

Without in any way trying to make comparisons or to comment at all upon the qualifications of any other man who has served us so well and so faithfully, it is my desire to state that since 1935, which began my term of service, I have never known a man who has more accurately represented, faithfully and ably served, the Republican Party and its numbers than has our colleague, JOE MARTIN.

We have heard rumors now and then about Members of the House and members of the executive departments which have raised questions as to certain highly desirable qualities which every public servant should have. Never, so far as I know, and I have had my ears and eyes open all the time, have I ever heard any insinuations or even any indirect inference which at any time to any degree questioned the integrity, the ability, or the faithfulness to his party, to the duties of his office, of my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN]. For more than 30 years, his sincerity, his loyalty, his devotion to the people of his district, his State, and our Nation, have never been questioned by friend or foe.

The Republicans in their wisdom saw fit the other day to change the House leadership of our party. As an individual member of the party, I have no comment to make about that, except to add that ambition is a jealous mistress and kindly virtues are sometimes forgotten or disregarded when she is on her way to a desired goal. There is, however, one good thing that may come from that action at our conference, and that is the notification to the Speaker, his party and the public that we will have more aggressive action toward our opposition.

We may in recent years, have lacked aggressiveness toward our political opponents but our action of Tuesday is proof positive that we are able and willing to fight if not the political enemy, then each other. My hope is that we may in the future direct our fire in the right direction.

If I understood the Speaker's remarks correctly, and I hope I did, he will certainly welcome and get our suggestions and we will get an adequate return in kind.

This coming session promises to be real interesting, and I have no doubt but that it will be helpful to the country as a whole and also to our party.

JOE's successor will get from Republicans the same loyal service given our former Speaker [Mr. MARTIN]. I am quite sure that we over here are united behind our leader's efforts to give the country a sound, safe program. I know personally that I will try to make it interesting for the Speaker and the opposition and I am sure that the Members on that side will endeavor to improve on our efforts.

Permit me to repeat that never have I met a more loyal, kindly friend, a more considerate leader, one more faithful to the true interests of the Republican Party and the Nation than our friend and former leader, JOE MARTIN. Well and faithfully has he served the trust given him by the people of his district, by his colleagues in the House.

JOE may talk about fading away, but that we will not permit. We need his advice, his wise counsel and his sympathetic and kindly consideration more than ever. We wish him a speedy and complete return to good health and vigor. He will be of inestimable assistance to those who seek to lead us.

PANAMA CANAL: FREE AND OPEN WATERWAY OR ANOTHER BERLIN?

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, in the last session of the Congress I made a series of addresses to the House on the question of jurisdiction and control of the Panama Canal. Extensively documented, those statements aimed at clarifying the issues with respect to Canal Zone sovereignty, which since the 1956 Suez crisis have mounted in frequency and gravity. Thus, it was not surprising to read in the press of the United States on December 20, 1958, that President Ernesto de la Guardia, Jr., of Panama, had signed a measure passed by the National Assembly of that country declaring the extension of Panama's territorial waters from the internationally recognized 3-mile limit to a 12-mile limit.

It may be asked why President de la Guardia gave his approval to the act in question. He is said to be a man of thoughtful, conservative views and action. The explanation may rest in the fact that he has been the object of relentless effort on the part of radical elements in Panama to displace him; that is to say, to throw him out of the presidency, even if violence is required. He may thus be constrained to acquiesce in matters of this character—which are undoubtedly accomplished under radical leadership—to relieve himself of some of the radical pressure. He must know that, to say the least, for any nation to attempt to extend arbitrarily its maritime limits cannot be effective, as such extensions must be by general international agreement.

In practical terms what does this alleged extension mean to the United States? It would completely surround the two seaward ends of the Canal Zone with Panamanian waters between them and the high seas, making this constitutional acquisition of the United States a maritime enclave, in effect, another Berlin. This, Mr. Speaker, is a matter that cannot be safely ignored, for it carries serious implications affecting all interoceanic commerce.

In consequence, agitations have renewed in the Spanish language press of Panama for still greater participation in the management of the Panama Canal enterprise. These include demands that vessels crossing Panamanian waters fly the flag of Panama, that Panama receive 50 percent of the gross income of the canal, and even that Panama charge rentals for buoys located in canal approaches. What further demands will be made by the Government of Panama, as a littoral state under international law, for the exercise of its police powers in the alleged belt, I cannot predict. But I do foresee that unless the present issue is adequately met that there will be more crises in the future.

Though the paramount principles in the Panama Canal setup were comprehensively covered in my previous addresses, some of them merit emphasis in the light of this latest development.

The first in importance is the Hay-Paunce fote Treaty requirement that the canal should be free and open to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations, on terms of entire equality. To meet this stipulation the framers of the 1903 treaty acquiring the Canal Zone provided for a strip of land and water that would include not only the artificially constructed waterway but also its maritime approaches to the high seas—approaches that were in nowise partial but altogether complete.

At the time of the 1903 treaty, the accepted principle governing the width of territorial waters authorized a limit of three nautical miles. Accordingly, the framers of this treaty defined the Canal Zone as beginning in the Caribbean Sea three marine miles from mean low water mark and extending to and across the Isthmus of Panama into the Pacific Ocean to a distance of three marine miles from mean low water mark. These limits, under international usage, were identical with those of the Republic of Panama.

Essential for providing free and open interocean transit of vessels of all nations, the maritime approaches to the Panama Canal are just as much parts of the waterway as its constructed channels, locks, lakes, and ports.

Is it to be assumed that the distinguished men who framed the canal treaties failed to recognize this obvious fact? Is it not clear that they laid out the Canal Zone to the high seas to prevent any exterior encroachments on free and open transit? Is it not also clear that, by their actions, they established the United States as the littoral state for the Canal Zone, with exclusive jurisdiction over Panama Canal approaches from the high seas to the entire exclusion of the exercise by Panama of any such right, power or authority in these approaches? Was it not necessary that all these conditions be established by treaty before the United States should, or would be justified, in undertaking the construction and operation of the canal? The answers to these questions must be obvious to anyone familiar with Isthmian history and the needs of shipping, for the sea approaches are just as necessary for efficient operation, maintenance, and protection of the Panama Canal as any other part of the project. Thus, the recent Panamanian act is a clear violation of treaty, for to be valid any extension of maritime territorial limits in the Isthmian region must automatically apply to the Canal Zone as well as to Panama.

Mr. Speaker, I have been living with the canal problem for a number of years. Our position in the Isthmian area has progressively deteriorated, not because of lack of strength but because of our mistaken policy of placation of elements hostile to the United States.

The current crisis at Panama I recognize as conforming to the familiar pattern of the long-range Communist plan for wresting ownership and control of the Panama Canal from the United States. Moreover, it conforms to the well-known technique of stating a position and building up a record for later negotiations or, in this case, for adjudication before an international tribunal, all with the idea of exacting a huge indemnity from the United States for the relinquishment of such marine claims.

It also follows the recent example of Iceland, where, in line with Communist policy, an attempted extension of Icelandic territorial waters to the 12-mile limit brought that country into direct conflict with Great Britain, which, by the way, properly and effectively ignored it. No such situation should be allowed to develop at Panama.

At this juncture, Mr. Speaker, I would point out to those in authority in Panama that the mounting series of unreasonable and unrealistic demands there will not result in United States or world approval. Instead, they will greatly strengthen the current pleas of communistic and other clamorous agitators for internationalizing the Panama Canal. In fact, they can have no other effect, for the canal can never be nationalized by Panama.

Here I wish to stress again the point I have made many times previously that if the United States should ever surrender its ownership and control of the Panama Canal, the great Isthmian waterway will not pass to Panamanian jurisdiction but to an international authority. Such organization would never be as liberal and understanding in its relations with Panama as the United States. Then, why do Panamanian leaders persist on a course that, in effect, amounts to Panama digging its own grave?

This leads me to state, Mr. Speaker, that the cause of internationalization, which is now being persistently pressed, has also been substantially aided and strengthened by reason of the fact that our own Government has practiced a policy of appeasement and silence rather than one of justice and fair play based solidly on the realistic facts involved—in other words, it has been playing possum in all these critical situations. It is abundantly evident that the Panama Canal problems thus arising are still drifting from bad to worse. Certainly, it is the solemn duty of those in responsible authority to reassert our long established and tested policies, the necessity for which have been so clearly and repeatedly demonstrated. We must not permit the piecemeal liquidation of the canal nor the creation of another Berlin at this artery of world commerce.

All of this, Mr. Speaker, emphasizes the imperative need for prompt approval by the Congress of House Concurrent Resolution 1, which is similar to House Concurrent Resolution 205, 85th Congress, and the formal refusal by the United States to recognize the present attempted stranglehold encirclement of the Canal Zone.

A news story in the Panama American of December 12, 1958, and an editorial in the Saturday Evening Post of October 25, 1958, supplying further documentation on the canal question, are commended for reading by all Members of Congress and others in policy positions. The indicated news story and editorial, together with House Concurrent Resolution 1, 86th Congress, follow:

[From the Panama American, Dec. 12, 1958]

SURROUND-CANAL-ZONE MEASURE OK'D—12-MILE-LIMIT LAW IS HEADED FOR PRESIDENCIA

A bill which could make the Canal Zone an area totally surrounded by the Republic of Panama—a sort of junior grade West Berlin—passed the main hurdle in the National Assembly last night and appeared headed smoothly for the desk of President Ernesto de la Guardia, Jr.

Whether the President will seek any changes in the present form of the bill before signing it into law could not be learned today.

By extending Panamanian territorial waters to 12 miles from the present 3 miles, the bill will have the effect of placing 9 miles of Panamanian territorial waters between the Canal Zone's 3 miles of jurisdiction and the open sea. Thus it will be impossible for a ship to approach or leave the Canal Zone without passing through Panamanian territorial waters, under direct Panamanian jurisdiction.

By unanimous vote the National Assembly passed the measure last night in second reading. Usually the passage of a bill in second reading is tantamount to enactment, since the third and final reading is more or less a formality.

The bill provides that the administration of the territorial waters will be in conformity with Panama's existing treaties.

In a committee report recommending the measure for passage, note is taken that the measure will not affect the 3-mile area to seaward granted to the United States at both the Atlantic and Pacific entrances of the canal.

The report adds, however, that the bill, if it becomes law, will give Panama a 9-mile zone of full sovereignty at both ends of the canal between the end of Canal Zone jurisdiction and the high seas.

When the bill was introduced into the assembly by Deputy Aquilino Boyd on December 1 it bore also the signature of one deputy of each of the major political factions in the assembly.

Besides Boyd, who was Foreign Minister until late last May, the deputies sponsoring the measure were Manuel R. Arias E., Diogenes Pino, Alfredo Aleman, Jr., Domingo Diaz Q., and Mario J. de Obaldia.

After the bill was sent to committee for study, two members of the present cabinet, Foreign Minister Miguel Moreno, and Education Minister Carlos Sucre testified before the body and suggested certain changes.

The text as approved yesterday is different from the original in some respects.

It provides that the Chief Executive will administer the law:

(a) In accordance with the constitution;

(b) In accordance with existing treaties;

(c) In accordance with the commitments of the United Nations Conference on the Rights of the Sea held in Geneva in 1958, and

(d) In accordance with Panama's position with regard to her historical waters. (This has reference to Panama's long-taken position that she has special rights in the Gulf of Panama.)

The law as initially introduced had the approval of Panama's delegation to the Conference on Rights of the Sea.

The committee report took note that the additional zone of 9 miles added to Panama's territorial waters embraces an area rich in fish.

It also notes that a number of other nations have extended their territorial waters to 12 miles. Among those named were: Egypt, Ecuador, Guatemala, Rumania, Honduras, the Soviet Union and Saudi Arabia.

The preamble to the law as introduced said also:

"It is of great importance for the Republic to declare that it extends its sovereign rights in a 12-mile zone of territorial sea along all its coasts, without prejudice to commitments in international treaties in force for the innocent passage of foreign ships which use the Panama Canal international navigation lane."

However, some press comments have indicated that if the law were passed it would permit Panama to stop and board such ships approaching or leaving the canal.

[From the Saturday Evening Post, Oct. 25, 1958]

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA CAN'T SURRENDER ITS RIGHTS IN THE PANAMA CANAL

Agitation in the Republic of Panama over the status of the Canal Zone features two claims: (1) "The canal is ours"; and (2) Panama and the United States are equal partners in the canal, and should therefore split its gross revenues 50–50, while we meet all expenses.

In this country, some voices, notably Mr. James Warburg's, have been raised to suggest that we should internationalize the canal, to set a good example to Colonel Nasser.

None of these proposals makes sense. There is no legitimate comparison between the position of the American Government at Panama and that of the Suez Company in Egypt. As Congressman FLOOD, (Democrat of Pennsylvania) has pointed out in several speeches, the Canal Zone is "constitutionally acquired territory of the United States." While the British Government owned 43.75 percent of the Suez Company, and its administration was largely French, the company was an Egyptian enterprise, operating on a 100-year lease, when Nasser expropriated it.

Our treaty of 1903 with the Republic of Panama gave us sovereign rights over a strip of land 10 miles wide across the isthmus. The stated purpose of the grant was that we might build, maintain, operate and defend an interoceanic canal, and the grant was perpetual.

We undertook to pay the Republic of Panama $10 million in 1903, and an annuity thereafter. The payments have been increased several times, and now stand at about $1,900,000. It is conceivable that this will be increased but the notion that Panama can rightfully claim a half share of the tolls is ridiculous. Yet it was put forward by the Deputy Foreign Minister of Panama, who now occupies a professor's chair at the University of Panama, where he instructs students in the fancied rights for which they riot periodically.

Charles Evans Hughes, Secretary of State in 1923, made this statement to the Minister from Panama, when he raised the question of sovereignty in the Canal Zone: "It is an absolute futility for the Panamanian Government to expect any American administration, no matter what it is, any President or any Secretary of State, ever to surrender any part of those rights which the United States has acquired under the treaty of 1903."

Considerations of international law and hemisphere security make the Hughes declaration of 1923 even more valid today.

COLLABORATION ON FISCAL POLICY

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. THORNBERRY). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. PELLY] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to express a few thoughts which seem to me both timely and important.

Obviously this Congress is faced with the responsibility of providing as fully as possible against any military peril from enemy attack. Also, we are charged with the duty of meeting properly the domestic needs of the Nation. Furthermore, the challenge in both these fields should be accomplished within the framework of Federal Treasury revenue and in line with sound anti-inflation policy.

Mr. Speaker, I think the budget can be balanced and may I say I believe it can be done without compromising either our security or such Government service to the people as is needed and necessary. I think it can be done and service given without undue inflation of the national debt or dissipation of the value of our dollar.

I have in mind that more than 100 years ago, Mr. Speaker, Lord Macaulay, the famous British historian, in a letter to a biographer of Thomas Jefferson, predicted that the United States would be, as he expressed it, as fearfully plundered and laid waste by barbarians in the 20th century as the Roman Empire was in the 5th century.

Macaulay was not referring to Russians invading and pillaging this land as Rome had been ravaged by Hun and Vandal. Rather he envisaged our collapse due to our own institutions and on account of what transpires perhaps in this very Congress and in this very year 1959.

Nor was Macaulay alone in such a fear. Indeed Thomas Jefferson himself had warned of such a catastrophe due to fiscal imprudence. Jefferson pointed to the danger to our independence, as he said, if our leaders load us with perpetual debt.

Jefferson's own words—and they apply equally well today—were:

We must make our choice between economy and liberty or profusion and servitude.

He said he placed economy "among the first and most important virtues and public debt as the grestest of dangers to be feared."

Mr. Speaker, during the difficult days ahead I hope those words of warning of Thomas Jefferson will be remembered.

President Eisenhower has called for holding the lid down on inflationary Federal spending. He emphasizes that this Nation is in danger of pricing itself out of world markets. He seeks to limit Government expenditures to an overall amount within the total of anticipated Government revenue.

Since I have promised to support such an economy effort, I am taking this means of suggesting certain areas where savings can be effected.

For example, the other day I was reading about Bolivia. In our foreign aid we underwrite a third of the total Bolivian budget. We have contributed $120 million in the last 4 years. This aid was to a foreign government which nationalized Bolivia's major industry, her tin mines, which were operating profitably and paying taxes. Now the mines are losing money and not paying taxes. Instead, the taxpayers of the United States are footing the bill.

To help bolster up Bolivia's economy in 1956, we donated U.S. Government wheat and flour. These gifts in turn were sold by Bolivia to private firms there who resold to the public. These private dealers through well-timed abolishment of a "pegged" exchange rate made a windfall profit on these products equal to some $3 million.

I think a study of Bolivian aid will show we might as well save our money, and I am equally confident it would be the same with many other foreign countries receiving our aid.

Why not study our own farm program right here at home. I see by a summary of 16 months operations ended last October 31 that farm surplus transactions of the Commodity Credit Corporation cost the Nation a loss of $1.2 billion. In November 1957 some 30 economists testifying before a Congressional Joint Economic Subcommittee were polled as to where to reduce the nondefense budget; farm spending was listed as the number one area for cuts. The soil bank is only the latest of laws which try to firm up farm prices and control production which have proved ineffective and fail to cure farm problems. It should not be renewed.

I think our agricultural expenditures are running at the rate now of almost $7 billion per annum. That money comes out of the taxpayer's pocket or will be charged to the national debt. Incidentally, payments in excess of $10,000 were made in 1957 to some 77 residents of my State of Washington for not planting wheat, and yet the total crop keeps climbing under the soil-bank acreage reserve program, which I may say, I voted against. According to the Department of Agriculture's own figures for the past year, with 25 percent less acreage in the Pacific Northwest under wheat production we still had a total of 10 percent increase in bushel production resulting in an overall staggering surplus of 1.3 billion bushels.

In searching for ways to hold down the inflationary Federal budget our agricultural program, I repeat, should most certainly come in for closer scrutiny, but I am not suggesting a cut in programs that help the handicapped or the aged or needy; nor would I favor a reduction in essential public service.

In my opinion, no general tax increase is called for, although instituting charges to those who use Government agencies could well be studied.

My thought is, Mr. Speaker, that since the Soviet Union expects a balanced budget with a comfortable surplus we had better get busy and think in terms of economic as well as scientific and military competition with Russia. I suggest it is the better part of wisdom for the Congress to forget partisanship and to forget, too, the 1960 elections. Congress should cooperate with the President and in this year of great prosperity, show the world some fiscal responsibility.

Incidentally, the people in this country who now enjoy a higher standard of living and greater freedom from want than ever before are entitled to have these gains protected. No group in America can gain, in fact, all will suffer unless the overall fiscal policy is sound. Let us collaborate on such a program during the ensuing months.

RAILROAD RETIREMENT LEGISLATION, 86TH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION, 1959

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. POFF] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. POFF. Mr. Speaker, no more important domestic legislation faces the Congress this year than the several bills already introduced and those which will later be introduced to amend and improve the Railroad Retirement Act, and I earnestly trust that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce will schedule prompt hearings and make a report at the earliest practicable date.

The record of the 85th Congress concerning such legislation was dismal indeed. Although several bills had been pending since January 1957, no legislation was reported until the summer of 1958, and the bill was not called up for floor action until the last week of the second session in August 1958. Even then, the bill had no opportunity to be considered on its own merits, because it was attached by the Senate as a rider to a longshoremen's bill which had absolutely nothing to do with railroad retirement. The railroad workers are familiar with this sorry performance and cannot understand why they were singled out for such discrimination. They are aware that Congress last year passed legislation of a related nature concerning other workers, including:

First. The pay increase bill for civil service workers and military personnel.

Second. The bill providing additional benefits for certain retired civil service workers.

Third. The bill authorizing a 6-percent increase in retirement benefits for military personnel.

Fourth. The bill extending by 50 percent the period of entitlement for unemployment benefits for all unemployed workers except railroad workers.

The railroad employees also recall that Congress last year passed legislation for the benefit of the railroads of this country, including:

First. S. 3778, the so-called Smathers report which was designed, among other things, to help equalize the competitive factor in the transportation industry.

Second. Legislation repealing the 3-percent freight tax and the excise tax on the transportation of coal.

In view of the continued furloughs and reduction in force, railroad employees quite naturally are asking how much of the $270 million savings resulting from this tax repeal went to stockholders, how much went to shippers, how much went to salaried employees of the railroad, and how much went to railroad wage earners.

What legislation should be considered when the committee schedules hearings? The list is almost endless, but to name just a few, the committee should carefully consider:

First. The bill to repeal the so-called "last employer" clause under which a railroad worker loses his retirement benefits if, at the time he retires, he is holding some little side job to earn a little additional income.

Second. The bill to repeal the "dual benefit restriction" on wives of retired railroad workers—happily, Congress has already repealed the restriction imposed in 1951 on employees and widows of employees.

Third. The bill to lower the wife's benefit age from 65 to 62 as has already been done for wives of retired social security workers.

Fourth. The bill to reduce the retirement age of women workers with less than 30 years' service from 65 to 62 as has already been done for women workers covered by social security—women workers with more than 30 years' service may retire under the present law at 60.

Fifth. The bill to reduce the retirement age of male workers after 30 years' service.

Sixth. The bill to repeal the antique test period of 1924–31 and inaugurate the 5 best years rule, under the application of which the retirement benefits of both active and retired workers would be increased.

Seventh. The bill to extend the period of entitlement for unemployment benefits for furloughed railroad workers. The need for prompt action on this bill is particularly urgent, because the period of entitlement authorized under the current law will expire for many furloughed workers sometime this month, in the dead of winter when the opportunity for reemployment is extremely remote.

Realistically, I know that all of this legislation cannot and will not be passed in this one session of Congress. Moreover, I realize that the passage of any of these bills would create an additional drain on the Railroad Retirement Fund which, according to the actuaries, is already operating at a deficit. Comparing the costs and benefits of the Railroad Retirement system with those of the Social Security System, I still find it hard to understand why there should have been an operating deficit in the last several years while employment was high and relatively stable. With so many unemployed today, the fund does not receive as much revenue and an operating deficit is more understandable. If unemployment is aggravating the deficit, and insofar as the deficit is not attributable to mismanagement and cannot be eliminated by economy in administrative expenditures, I believe the average railroad worker still fortunate enough to be employed would be willing to pay a higher tax rate to help liquidate the deficit and finance the cost of the additional benefits incorporated in some of the foregoing bills. However, I am convinced that the workers would vigorously oppose an increase in the tax base. An increase in the tax base from $350 to $400 as proposed in legislation introduced last year would reduce, and in some cases completely destroy, the private supplemental retirement programs in which many railroad workers participate.

The current tax rate is 6¼ percent on both the employee and the employer. How much that rate would have to be increased to liquidate the deficit and finance additional benefits would depend upon which benefits the committee decides to approve and could be calculated only by the members of the committee. If the benefits recommended by the committee are acceptable, if the rate increase recommended by the committee is reasonable and if the committee does not recommend an increase in the tax base, I believe the membership of the House will overwhelmingly support the bill reported by the committee. However, during the course of the hearings, the committee must be careful to solicit the advice and listen to the testimony of representatives not only of railroad management but of the railroad workers themselves who, we must never forget, help to finance and own the Railroad Retirement Fund. Railroad workers are reasonable men and women. They want to protect the solvency of their fund; and they will be willing to cooperate with management and with Congress in the drafting of a sensible program which will help relieve the problems of the unemployed, increase job opportunities by reducing the voluntary retirement age and meet the financial crisis of those already on the retirement rolls.

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POFF. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. PELLY. I am very glad to know that the gentleman is interested in that particular legislation. It is something that interests me, and I join with him in the hope that there will be prompt action. I want to compliment the gentleman from Virginia for his very fine comments.

Mr. POFF. I thank the gentleman.

STUDY ADEQUACY OF COMPENSATION IN FEDERAL LAND ACQUISITIONS

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. TELLER] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. Speaker, I have reintroduced my bill to create a Commission To Study Adequacy of Compensation in Federal Land Acquisitions. Now that almost a year has passed since my original proposal was introduced as H.R. 9994, 85th Congress, referred to the Committee on Public Works, and given study by the executive agencies, I believe we should be able to move to immediate consideration of this proposal and put an end to the haphazard piecemeal and uncorrelated efforts that have been made to patch the defects in the current procedures.

While the Constitution of the United States says that no private property shall be taken for public use without just compensation, there are many real losses suffered for which there is no compensation. The Federal courts have classed these losses as consequential damages, a term that has become so comprehensive as to include the special value of property to an individual; the disruption or even destruction of a business and the loss of its good will; accelerated depreciation of machinery in moving from one location to another; new or increased interest charges resulting from the move; and the difference between the value of the property required for public use and the price that must be paid for a replacement site.

The awareness of the Congress to these problems is evident from the fact that we have authorized the Defense Department, the Department of the Interior and the Urban Renewal Administrator to make limited payments for moving expenses. In doing so, however, we have not only not gone far enough, we have established dual standards. There is a different basis for the payments authorized in Defense Department projects from those allowed in urban renewal projects. While this limited reimbursement does not fully compensate those involved, no moving expenses can be paid by any other agency. The inequity suffered by those whose property is required for a post office building or, for example, a civil airport such as that for the Washington area, is thereby heightened. An article appearing in the January 1958 issue of the Appraisal Journal, a publication of the American Institute of Real Estate Appraisers, served to focus attention on the continuing piecemeal, and almost haphazard, approach to this subject. Entitled "Review of Efforts To Minimize Losses in Condemnation," by Milton A. Pearl, an attorney with the Department of the Army, the article discusses the need for action, the various proposals now pending before many of our committees, and comes to what I submit are these sound conclusions:

> If the many committees of Congress studying the adequacy of compensation in condemnation cases continue their separate paths it will lead inevitably to a further divergence in the legislative authorization. Economies of time, effort, and money, plus the obvious desirability of having all Federal agencies acquire land under the same rules, indicate the benefits that will be derived if a halt is called to the piecemeal approach and the task of finding a solution is given to one group having no other responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker, in the basic struggle in which we are engaged today our greatest asset is the fairness, freedom, and good will of the democratic way of life. If we are depriving even a small percentage of our citizens of their property, without compensating them in full for all of their losses, we are defeating our own purpose. It is submitted that we must review this problem with the same sense of urgency that we must give to the development of missiles and to the acquisition of the land and the establishment of facilities for their testing, launching, and use.

During the 2d session of the 85th Congress in 1958 a law was enacted authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make payments for moving expenses resulting from land acquisitions. However, during this same session, Congress refused to pass a law authorizing similar payments to people forced to move because of the establishment of the second Washington airport at Chantilly, Va. Why the difference in treatment between the two types of projects? Will some acquisitions be singled out by this Congress and additional losses made compensable while repayment will be denied for losses in other cases despite the equally meritorious character of claims?

In the past few years, Mr. Speaker, many Members of our Congress have been faced with the problem of their constituents' inability to move without hardship when displaced by the condemnation of their homes or places of business. I think more and more of us are coming to a realization that an overall study to establish uniformity in all types of acquisitions is essential.

Although I am one of those who recognize the need for uniformity, I, too, have problems in my own district, problems which are encountered in other districts and are national in character. These problems are here today and will not be gone tomorrow unless the commission to study the adequacy of compensation is established without undue delay and accomplishes its mission expeditiously.

Since the Committee on Banking and Currency will be considering a housing bill in the near future and may desire to take action to relieve the plight of those displaced by urban renewal projects before Congress has enacted legislation for a study to establish uniformity, I have also reintroduced two bills which I first introduced last year designed to provide additional assistance for those who are displaced by urban renewal projects.

My proposals in connection with urban renewal projects would provide for reimbursement by the Federal Government to such displaced persons as follows:

First. They authorize payment for indirect as well as direct expenses and losses.

Second. The bills also permit payments to tenants for the difference in rental for 1 year between the old rental and the higher rental which they might be obliged to pay for new homes or businesses.

Third. The bills also allow payment to businessmen of a fair and reasonable value of their business if they cannot find a new location and if they are not offered a preference in the redevelopment project itself.

Fourth. The bills also increase the maximum payments to $500 in the case of an individual or family and $10,000 in the case of a businessman. Existing law authorizes payments for "reasonable and necessary moving expenses and any actual direct losses of property except goodwill or profit" limited to $100 in the case of an individual or family or $2,500 in the case of a business concern.

Fifth. Finally, the bills empower the Administrator of the Small Business Administration to make low-cost loans to those displaced by urban renewal projects.

Mr. Speaker, in the reintroduced bill "To establish a Commission To Study the Adequacy of Compensation," I have adopted suggestions for amendment made by Army Secretary Brucker in a letter to the chairman, Committee on Public Works. I have also made other modifications in the light of events during the past year. I think that this should be a nonpartisan undertaking. It is clearly one with which we are all concerned.

Although I have requested the views of the Bureau of the Budget, I have to date received no comment from Mr. Stans. Since the Army letter to the Public Works Committee stated that the Bureau of the Budget had no objection, I have concluded that the Army's position on behalf of the Department of Defense, recommending favorable consideration of my proposal, is the administration's position. Therefore I present my bill as a noncontroversial proposal, and I hope it will receive bipartisan support and early enactment.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1959

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAWSON] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAWSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill, H.R. 300, which I hope will be enacted as the Civil Rights Act of 1959. This bill is entitled "A bill to protect and enforce the constitutional rights of all persons to the equal protection of the laws, and for other purposes." It will provide a positive approach to aid in solving one of the major problems facing this country today—that of protecting and enforcing the constitutional rights of all persons to be equally protected under laws that conform to the Constitution.

As the national conscience struggles to free itself from its sad and ancient burden of racial discrimination, the dwindling minority of those who want to retain the outmoded relics of human slavery become more desperate in their fears and emotions. They foster strife and violence, they defy the law, and where they can they use the instruments of law in efforts to frustrate or at least delay the achievement of equality under law.

Schools, homes, and temples of worship have been bombed. Freedom of assembly and expression has been stifled. Thousands of schoolchildren have been locked out of their schools. Multitudes of citizens are being denied the most basic right of democracy—the right to vote. Yet for 5 long years the President has followed a passive, do-as-little-as-possible policy, in the hope that somehow, sometime, the spirit of human kindness and fair play that is inherent in the American people will melt the organized defiance of those who would rather destroy the American Constitution than permit it to be applied equally to every American.

Events have shown, however, that such a policy is weak and ineffectual at best, and more often it incites and encourages resistance and violence. The problem cannot be wished away. A positive program is required to treat this illness in our national life.

This grave problem is not sectional. It is national. Its impact on the Nation is heavy. It cannot be solved solely by local and voluntary groups and individuals, nor can it be left to the cumbersome procedures of litigation. The Congress and the executive branch of the Federal Government, as well as the judicial branch, are duty bound to protect the constitutional rights of the people.

My bill provides practical means for fulfilling this constitutional duty. It will promote new avenues of understanding, communication, and persuasion, while at the same time furnishing necessary financial aid and legal sanctions. Title I will authorize the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to provide technical assistance to aid, through educational means, in preventing or eliminating denials of constitutional rights based on racial or religious grounds. Title II will authorize Federal grants of funds needed by States or school districts in complying with the decisions of the Federal courts to end racial segregation. Title III will authorize the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to work out plans for desegregation of public schools in cooperation with the affected committees.

My bill will also authorize the Attorney General to seek the aid of courts to achieve elimination of public school segregation, to protect the constitutional rights to equal protection of the laws for persons who, because of poverty or community hostility, are unable to institute court suits, to prevent interference with officials who are seeking to provide equal protection of the laws, to prevent interference with persons obeying a court order protecting such rights, and to protect those who are being denied their constitutional rights because they have protested actions which deny such rights to others.

The Nation can no longer afford to remain on the sidelines while the legal rights of its citizens are being violated, frustrated, and deferred. It is high time that the Federal Government fulfill its constitutional promise of equal protection of the laws.

Mr. Speaker, I devoutly hope that this bill will be enacted in this session of Congress. I call upon my colleagues in this Congress to join in the great cause of protecting and enforcing the constitutional rights of every American.

Nicolas; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Address by Hon. Harry F. Byrd, of Virginia, Before the Illinois Manufacturers' Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, January 9, 1959

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an address I delivered in Chicago, Ill., on December 11, 1958, before the Illinois Manufacturers' Association.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ABSTRACT OF SPEECH DELIVERED BY SENATOR HARRY F. BYRD, DEMOCRAT, OF VIRGINIA, BEFORE THE ILLINOIS MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION, AT THE CONRAD HILTON HOTEL, CHICAGO, ILL., DECEMBER 11, 1958

These are times when prudent men should analyze the changes which are occurring against the indisputable fact that free enterprise democracy is the source of this country's greatness.

There is no doubt that developments such as those in atomic energy, rocketry, and so forth, have placed us upon the threshold of a new era.

In addition, this country is experiencing great increase in population.

While we may have unduly exploited our resources, they are still tremendous.

Our productive know-how and capacity are yet unsurpassed.

These are elements on which free enterprise democracy should thrive, and proceed soundly and constructively for the good of all mankind.

Our free enterprise democracy is the greatest system the world has ever evolved. But there is one controlling requirement, and it must never be overlooked. The system is based on solvent government and sound money.

It is in this requirement that we have allowed ourselves to become weak. This basic requirement of our system is equally vital to all of us as individuals, and to every segment of our people—labor, management, agriculture, finance, professions, government, and so forth.

With fiscal soundness I would have no fear for the future, economically or militarily. I would anticipate the period ahead with enthusiasm for my children and with pride in the contribution of my own generation.

Without solvency and sound money there will be neither solid economic progress nor national security with military preparedness.

Assurance of fiscal soundness in the future does not now exist. This is my concern.

We cannot perpetuate national solvency and integrity of the dollar through continuous deficit spending, unchecked national debt, and spiraling inflation. This situation jeopardizes our system of government and our future.

With only two bona fide exceptions, we have been on a deficit financing basis for 29 years. The fiscal situation deteriorated faster this year than in any comparable peacetime period to my knowledge.

Between January and June, we moved from estimates of virtually balanced budgets in the past and current years to combined deficits totaling $15 billion.

At the present rate, Federal agencies would spend more than $400 billion in 5 years. This would mean a Federal debt of more than $300 billion is in immediate prospect. This would be the highest national debt in the history of the world.

During the past session of Congress we were forced to raise the statutory limit on the national debt twice within 7 months. This was unprecedented. But we are forewarned. Some people are now contending the recent election was a mandate for even more dangerous Federal spending activity.

If more programs for nonessential spending should be adopted by the new Congress to be convened next month, our fiscal situation will deteriorate faster next year.

From experience it is to be expected that, if such new programs are enacted they will be long-term in nature with huge multiyear commitments for the future. It is programs of this kind that make the Federal budget so difficult to reduce when the necessity is upon us.

Contrary to general understanding, recent great increases in Federal spending have not been for defense and foreign aid. They have been for domestic-civilian programs.

Since 1954, expenditures outside of defense, atomic energy, and foreign aid categories have increased from $19.1 billion a year to $33.4 billion. This is an increase of $14.3 billion, or 75 percent.

It is in this category where we find so many Federal programs which may be popular, or even desirable, but nonessential.

Much of the domestic-civilian spending is for subsidies. And many of these subsidy programs are bottomless pits for Federal spending and contribute to sky-high inflation. Most of the proposals following the recent election were of this nature.

The Federal Government of the United States cannot now pay its bills except by increasing debt and inflation. Revenue from present tax rates does not meet our commitments.

Interest on the Federal debt is now taking more than 11 cents out of every tax dollar, and chronic inflation has reduced the purchasing power of our money 52 percent. The American dollar is now worth 48 cents by the 1939 index.

Inflation destroys fixed incomes, provident investment, prudent business, sound financing, national security, and democratic government.

More than 20 years of destructive inflation in this country to date have led to continual demands for increased subsidization.

The Federal Government is now subsidizing business, industry, private finance, agriculture, transportation, power, health, education, States, localities, individuals, and so forth.

By the process of cheapening our money and centralizing power in the Federal Government, we have descended to a level of state socialism which is obvious, if not admitted.

Social democracy is a subterfuge for sound government and constructive enterprise. Its evils are historically documented wherever nations have stooped to it.

Herein lies my concern, as I indicated before. Our free enterprise democracy is being undermined. In our present position there is no assurance of fiscal soundness for the future. In these circumstances, how can we hope fully to develop the great potentialities which lie ahead?

I think the situation is urgent. We must start Federal fiscal recovery immediately. Such recovery must start with balancing the budget, reducing the debt, and stopping inflation.

This must be our goal. Responsibility for achieving it lies equally upon the President, the Congress, and the people of the United States, individually and collectively.

The President originates budget recommendations, and the Congress enacts the authority for Federal spending. Both respond to the expressed will of the people.

The budget for the new fiscal year, beginning July 1, is being formulated at the White House now. I discussed the situation with the President last August when Congress adjourned. I have noted his actions since that time, especially his orders of the last few weeks. I hope and believe he will recommend a balanced budget for next year.

I have come to Chicago today to emphasize the seriousness of the problems confronting us. I believe by your own examination you would find I do not exaggerate the conditions we have allowed to develop, or the consequences we might expect if we continue on our present course.

The Federal position alone is bad enough, but we must keep the whole picture in view.

As background keep these facts in mind:

Total public expenditures in this country—Federal, State, and local—this year will be approximately $145 billion.

Federal, State, and local governments this year will take approximately $130 billion out of the pockets of American taxpayers in revenue receipts from all sources.

In their regular budgets Federal, State, and local governments this year will run deficits totaling some $15 billion.

Public debt—Federal, State, and local—this year will approach $350 billion.

Private debt now totals more than $500 billion.

This means our economy is burdened with indebtedness amounting to between $800 billion and $900 billion. This is close to a trillion dollars. These are figures beyond ordinary comprehension.

When individuals become insolvent, they take bankruptcy and dispose of their obligations. When governments become insolvent their money becomes worthless, and they go through some kind of a revolution wringer. The nature and the process may vary. But invariably the form of government is changed. Democratic government, as we have known it, could not survive.

Of course, I concede the necessity of deficits in extreme national emergencies.

For the first 150 years of our history we met our emergencies when they arose, but when they were over we promptly restored sound financing, characterized by balanced budgets, and began paying off the debt.

Under this practice, combined with our wealth and natural resources, this Nation grew great in the short span of a century and a half. But in our time we have not only continued exploitation of our resources, we have abandoned our traditional policy of fiscal soundness.

For 25 years, through 1955, we were on a deficit basis without real exception. In that period the Federal debt rose from about $16 billion to $274 billion, and from 1939 the value of the dollar dropped at an average of more than 3 cents a year.

Finally, in 2 consecutive fiscal years, 1956 and 1957, we brought the Federal budget back into real balance. At the same time we financed substantial tax reduction, reduced the debt, and slowed inflation down to a virtual stop.

After a quarter century of deficit financing, rising debt and spiraling inflation these balanced budgets gave us reason to hope we were back on an even peacetime keel.

But for reasons I shall never understand, the President in January 1957 brought in his budget for fiscal year 1958 proposing an $8 billion increase in expenditures. It was the biggest peacetime spending budget to that date.

You remember that budget 2 years ago. The country was shocked. There has never been anything like the opposition which developed spontaneously from the grassroots of this Nation.

Congress responded, and reduced appropriations by billions. But in the complexities of big government, with tremendous balances remaining in prior appropriations, expenditures rose notwithstanding. They were rising before sputnik and recession appeared on the scene.

This brought us to the conditions of the past fiscal year which ended June 30 and the present fiscal year which started July 1. Original estimates for these 2 years showed a combined surplus of $2.3 billion. By the latest figures this has changed to a combined deficit of $15 billion.

I emphasize these figures to tell the story of recordbreaking deterioration in the Federal fiscal situation.

Seizing upon sputnik and recession as justification, Congress in the past session insisted upon enactment of legislation which could require Federal expenditures at an annual rate of $80 billion for years to come.

All of the New Deal recovery programs from 1933 to 1939 combined cost us only about half of the current year expenditure budget.

This year's budget was exceeded only in the 2 peak years of World War II.

The Korean war has been over more than 5 years. But Federal budgets in that costly campaign never came close to the level of Federal expenditures reached this year.

When the present administration came into office it established a commendable record. It reduced expenditures in 2 consecutive fiscal years—1954 and 1955.

But from a low point of $64.5 billion in that period, expenditures have now been increased to this year's estimate of $81.7 billion. For accurate comparison this figure includes expenditures for highways and Federal National Mortgage Association which are now financed through so-called trust funds.

To show the tremendous increase in domestic-civilian expenditures—straight from the budget documents, here is the Federal spending record for the period from fiscal year 1954 to date:

1. In categories other than domestic-civilian:

Expenditures for military functions have been increased $500 million, from $40.3 billion to $40.8 billion.

Expenditures for stockpile and defense production have been decreased $600 million from $1 billion to $400 million.

Expenditures for atomic energy have been increased $700 million, from $1.9 billion to $2.6 billion.

Expenditures for foreign military assistance have been decreased $1.4 billion from $3.6 billion to $2.2 billion.

Expenditures for foreign economic aid have been increased $400 million from $1.5 billion to $1.9 billion.

Expenditures for international affairs have been increased $100 million, from $200 million to $300 million.

From these figures, it can be seen that Federal expenditures in categories other than domestic-civilian have been decreased $300 million since 1954, from $48.6 billion to $48.3 billion.

2. But in the same period since 1954, domestic-civilian expenditures have been increased $14.3 billion, from $19.1 billion to $33.4 billion.

Federal expenditures, fiscal years 1954–59

[1] For comparison, includes trust fund expenditures of Federal National Mortgage Association beginning fiscal year 1955, and highways beginning fiscal year 1957.

NOTE.—Figures are rounded and may not add to totals.

I suggest the new proposal to expand the urban renewal program as an example of domestic-civilian programs which are bottomless pits for Federal expenditures.

In the first place, I think people should keep up their own property. I know of no reason why the Federal Government should absorb two-thirds of the loss entailed in cleaning up huge city subdivisions to be used for private profit.

Federal funds already available for this program total $1 billion for loans and $1.2 billion for cash grants. These tremendous sums will not be a drop in the bucket if we are to undertake these projects in cities and towns from one end of this country to the other.

Federal subsidies generally constitute a vast field of domestic-civilian expenditures. The Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures is contemplating a study of the subject.

At the outset we are confronted with two questions: What is a subsidy? Who is subsidized?

Nearly 40 million people will receive direct payments from the Federal Treasury this year. This includes nearly 200,000 Federal employees working overseas. Generally speaking, these 40 million people with their families could reach a number equivalent to half of the population of the United States.

Nearly $80 billion is outstanding at this moment under so-called Federal credit programs for housing, veterans, agriculture, commerce, defense production, small business, and so forth. This has increased $12 billion in the last 3 years.

Grants to State and local governments now total $4.9 billion. There are now 62 programs for State and local subsidy.

When I came to the Senate 25 years ago, there was only one State aid program of any consequence. That was the highway program which was costing $250 million.

I mention these categories of Federal expenditures simply to illustrate the areas where there may be subsidies which do not meet the eye. There are others. For instance, who is subsidized by the postal deficit?

It may be contended that the foreign agricultural trade development programs are another subsidy to American agriculture.

Are the beneficiaries of government contracts with industry and institutions subsidized to the degree that they think they have a vested interest in the level of Federal expenditures? Reaction to justifiable reductions a year ago would indicate an affirmative answer.

A great fallacy has been built up around Federal payments, whether you call them subsidies or choose to avoid the ugly word. People have gotten the idea that they are getting something for nothing.

There is no greater mistake. American taxpayers sooner or later pay every dime of the expenditures through these programs, and more.

When we are on a sound basis we pay these costs directly from taxes. If we are on a deficit basis we charge them into the debt, pay interest on the loan until we pay off the obligation, and stimulate inflated prices in the process.

In either event, about 15 percent goes into overhead for Federal administration. Since I have been in the Senate, interest on the Federal debt has cost the taxpayers of this country more than $100 billion.

Until we get Federal expenditures down, balance the budget, and stop inflation, there is no hope for sound tax reduction. To reduce taxes when we are on a deficit basis simply charges the tax cut into the Federal debt. This aggravates the whole deficit-debt-inflation cycle.

Others may have their own programs for the coming new Congress. Mine would have two objectives. The first would be to balance the Federal budget. The second would be legislation to correct abuses practiced by unscrupulous labor leaders primarily against labor itself, but also against management and the public.

Practices revealed by the McClellan Labor Rackets Committee are a national disgrace. I voted for legislation in the past session of Congress to correct these abuses. I shall vote for it again this year. It should have the support of the rank and file of labor, management and the general public.

I am frequently accused of being against labor. This is because I support the best interest of the laboring man; not the powerful labor czar.

I favor the right to work. But statements by certain labor leaders make it definite that when the new Congress convenes, great effort will be made to enact legislation to make States right-to-work laws invalid.

This would be another usurpation of State authority and still further concentration of power at Washington. Such an effort should be resisted to the utmost.

It is certain, too, that these same labor leaders will attempt to federalize unemployment insurance now administered by the States.

A strong effort to this end was made last year. As chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, I fought the proposal and it was defeated.

The purpose of the move to federalize unemployment insurance is not only to standardize the law for all States, but also the payments for all business and industry.

To federalize unemployment insurance would mean that the powerful labor lobby would be constantly applying pressure on Congress for increased benefits and extension of the payment period.

Early introduction of both of these proposals is certain, and the need to resist them is obvious. In our present condition, I think the Government of the United States is dangerously vulnerable to the influence of ruthless labor dictators.

I am fully aware that the achievement of both of my objectives—correcting abuses by labor leaders and balancing the Federal budget—will be extremely difficult. I am the only man remaining in the Senate who voted against the Wagner Act and for 25 years I have analyzed the budgets submitted by three Presidents.

Year after year I have gone over every expenditure and appropriation item, and these number some 1,100.

I know the problems involved in our outmoded appropriation procedures. I know the devices which have been developed to bypass appropriation control, such as authority to spend directly from the public debt.

I know how difficult it is to reduce expenditures when unexpended balances in prior appropriations approach or exceed the new requests to which annual congressional action ordinarily is limited.

In the current year approximately $147 billion will be available to Federal spending agencies, $75 billion or more in new spending authorizations enacted this year, and approximately $72 billion in unexpended balances carried over from prior years.

The President has a dual responsibility: First, to originate the budget with requests for the new year and, second, to administer the expenditures from both old and new money. I hope he will take the lead not only in balancing the Federal expenditure budget for the coming year, but in the full recovery of our fiscal stability.

On my own experience I submit that expenditure reductions of the necessary magnitude, if applied with care and wisdom, would strengthen our economy, strengthen our Government, strengthen our national defense and strengthen our international position.

I am certain that such reductions can be made in all of the Federal spending categories—military, foreign aid, and domestic-civilian.

With respect to defense expenditures, we should rechart the whole military program and reevaluate the objectives of our spending in view of changing methods of warfare.

I yield to no one in advocacy of national defense but, as the President has said, there is waste and duplication in the military departments.

We unified the armed services. We adopted the Eberstadt amendments for businesslike operations in the Military Establishment. We passed the Military Procurement Act. We revised military pay scales and increased survivors benefits to allow the Armed Forces to compete for capable personnel. In the past session of Congress we enacted the military reorganization bill.

It is time these actions paid off in economy and efficiency for more defense at less money.

The waste in foreign aid, especially economic aid, has been obvious from its inception. We enacted the Marshall plan in 1948 for 4 years. Postwar foreign aid expenditures have now run more than a decade. To date our gross authorizations for foreign aid expenditures have totaled more than $80 billion.

Expenditures for economic aid should be sharply curtailed. Our best interests, and those of our allies, would be better served by preserving the integrity of the American dollar to stimulate international trade.

I know basic legislation will be required for substantial reduction in domestic-civilian expenditures. This will require the exercise of statesmanlike leadership by the President and the unwavering support of Congress and the public.

But I urge the President in his January budget message to submit a blueprint for substantial expenditure reductions in all categories and to follow through with specific legislative recommendations where they are necessary. I pledge him my support and I hope this objective will have yours.

I am aware of the cynical contention that what this country wants is continuing inflation and a fast-buck economy, with no regard for the certain consequences and the next generation.

But I feel certain that the great majority of the people of this Nation want the integrity of our money protected, want their form of government preserved, and want their free enterprise system to survive, in order that we may pursue this Nation's great mission in the world.

If this is what we want, we must have a national crusade from the grassroots to save our representative democracy which is founded upon the free enterprise system.

Such a crusade must be inspired and led by the President. It must be supported by the Congress—House and Senate. Most important of all, it must be fired by the people themselves.

From long experience in the Senate of the United States I can say the voice of the people in this country, if it is loud enough, will overcome selfish and highly organized minorities and will prevail—that is the great virtue of our constitutional democracy as contrasted with dictatorship.

So the job is up to you and every other citizen.

Our people must remember that the very foundation of our democracy rests upon the fact that people must support the Government. It is not the purpose of Government to support the people.

The national interest must come ahead of private gain.

So, to achieve our objectives, there must be sacrifice all down the line.

Bill To Repeal Certain Federal Excise Taxes

OF
HON. JOHN LESINSKI
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, January 9, 1959

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker on January 7 I introduced H.R. 388, a bill which will directly benefit the great majority of our people and will make greatly needed revision in our tax structure. Everyone wants a simpler and fairer tax structure. My bill goes a long way toward effectuating this desire. It accomplishes this goal by providing for repeal of the Federal retailers' excise taxes, the manufacturers' excise taxes with the exception of those levied under our highway financing program, and the excise taxes levied on facilities and services.

At the present time, the federally imposed excise taxes create a heavy burden on the American people. True, we must impose burdensome taxes to pay for our heavy expenditures needed for defense, public welfare, interest on the debt, and other necessary Government functions. But a tax structure which imposes such a hodgepodge of taxes as the excise taxes requires substantial revision. These excises have been imposed indiscriminately, largely in emergency times, without much consideration of whom they are hurting or discriminating against. Subsequently they have been repealed, restored, revised, and amended many times, but in no systematic fashion. As a result, a host of inconsistencies, incongruities, and anomalies have become imbedded in the tax structure.

Although I would like to see all the Federal excise taxes discarded immediately, I have restricted my bill to the retailers' taxes, the manufacturers' taxes which are not used to finance the highway program, and the taxes on facilities and services. My bill, therefore, will repeal the retailers' taxes imposed on toilet preparations; luggage, handbags, and other leather articles; jewelry and related items; and furs. It will eliminate the manufacturers' taxes imposed on automobiles, parts and accessories; lubricating oil; automotive and related items; household type equipment; entertainment and recreational equipment; business machines; pens, mechanical pencils, and lighters; and matches. And, it will repeal the excise taxes imposed on telephone and other communication facilities and services, which include also those levied on admissions, club dues, transportation of persons, and safe deposit boxes. Repeal will be effective after the date of the enactment of the act.

The manufacturers' taxes which are used to finance the highway program and which will not be repealed by my bill are those automotive taxes imposed on gasoline, trucks and buses, diesel fuel, tires and inner tubes, and tread rubber. These taxes provide funds which benefit the highway users, and consequently can be justified from that standpoint. Furthermore, it is a fair and expeditious way to finance an accelerated highway construction program. The bill does not affect the taxes on alcoholic beverages and tobacco, although I do believe some adjustment should be made with respect to the taxes on alcoholic beverages for it is my understanding that the additional appropriations needed to police this law offset the revenue received. Some of the miscellaneous excise taxes which impose relatively small general burdens are excluded.

Many of the excise taxes were imposed as temporary measures during emergency periods but are still with us today, many of them at even higher rates. Many industries have been hurt by the imposition of these taxes. Occasionally, after a long and bitter fight by the affected industries and individual businesses, some of these taxes were repealed or modified, but in many cases considerable damage was already done. What we need is the removal of the excise taxes that are imposed indiscriminately with no regard of the effect they have.

An important reason for my desire to repeal at least some of the excise taxes is that these taxes are contrary to our generally accepted principle of taxation in accordance with ability to pay. The greatest impact of the excise taxes falls on the consumers with the low incomes. They are regressive taxes. Through its various features, such as the progressive income tax rate schedule, our tax structure attempts to lessen inequalities in income; but the excise taxes work contrary to this objective. Regressivity results not only from taxes paid directly by the consumer on commodities and services they purchase, but also from the taxes paid by business on commodities and services it purchases. The impact of these latter taxes is felt indirectly, because they are a cost item which are reflected in higher prices charged to the consumer. We should, therefore, reduce our reliance on these regressive taxes and place more reliance on the other forms of taxes, principally the income tax which imposes tax burdens in accordance with our ability to pay.

Elimination of Federal excise taxes will be an important stride toward simplifying the problems of our Federal-State-local relations. In spite of all the studies, both official and nonofficial, on the problems of overlapping taxes in the United States the basic problems still remain with us. Essential to the solution of these problems is the removal of at least some of the Federal excise taxes. The Federal Government imposes numerous selected excise taxes on top of those imposed by the States and local governments. As a result of these multiple levels of taxation, State and local governments must limit their taxation of these sources, although they, too, are faced with increasing costs of financing their government activities. Withdrawal of the Federal Government from some of these sources would enable the States to tap some of these sources of revenue to help them be more self-sustaining and less dependent on aid from the Federal Government. This will help restore some of the sovereignty and independence which the States formerly had and should continue to have.

Some of the Federal excise taxes are imposed on what are essentially local services, such as local telephone calls and admissions. Others discriminate largely against certain sections of the country. Some discriminate against industries which are located largely in only a few geographic areas. Such discriminations should be eliminated, or at least mitigated by repealing the excise taxes enumerated in my bill.

We have recently experienced a serious economic downturn, from which we were fortunate in recovering before it reached a critical stage. One of the hardest hit areas was Detroit, the center of automobile production. This economic doldrum in Detroit had its repercussions in many sections of the country where parts and materials going into the production of automobiles come from. In spite of a serious curtailment of automobile production, no legislation was passed to reduce or repeal the 10-percent Federal excise tax on automobiles. Such action would have made it possible for the automobile industry to reduce car prices, and thereby stimulate automobile sales and general economic recovery. Repeal of this onerous tax on automobiles will be a welcome supplement to other Government action taken to avoid any recurrence of a similar depression of economic activity. The tax saving to the consumers will, I earnestly believe, help to maintain a thriving automobile industry, and, consequently, a thriving general economy through its effect on all industries concerned with supplying automotive parts and materials.

On the whole, repeal of the taxes included in my bill will increase business activity and generate higher incomes which will provide higher income tax revenues to the Government. It will do this because it will lead to a reduction in the prices of goods and services to the consumer. Lower prices will stimulate demand for more of these products. Greater sales by these businesses will in turn have favorable effects on other businesses. Resulting higher business incomes will provide a larger income tax base. Thus, any loss in revenues from the repeal of these excises will probably be largely offset or even possibly exceeded by additional income tax revenues to the Government.

In conclusion, let me urge every Member of Congress, particularly those on the Ways and Means Committee, to act favorably on my bill. Removal of these excise taxes will correct some of the undesirable features of the present complex and unreasonable "system" of excise taxes. It will alleviate some of the burden which falls heaviest on the low income groups. And, it will contribute to a simplification of Federal-State-local relationships. Although the Government will in the short run lose revenues from the repeal of these taxes, it will recoup the loss largely from additional business induced by the removal of these taxes. At the same time, it will promote a healthier economic climate for industry. In view of these desirable benefits which will result from enactment of my bill, I urge immediate and favorable action on it.

Will Congress Save Our Priceless Heritage?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BEN F. JENSEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 9, 1959

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, the election of last November 4 gave the Democratic Party an overwhelming majority in both Houses of Congress, which, Mr. Speaker, imposes a greater responsibility on your party—and especially on you, as leader of the party in control—than you have ever experienced in all your years as Speaker of this august body. I am sure you are well aware of that fact, and that the future welfare of America depends to a very great degree on your every act and decision during this session of Congress.

The time has come to speak plainly. Many Members who had the contracted support of Reuther's so-called liberal labor party were elected last November and, of course, they are expected to blindly follow orders from the organization which contributed greatly to their campaign, since they are bought and paid for. But, I sincerely hope it is not yet too late for us to profit from the costly experience which England suffered under the Fabian Socialists, who also masqueraded under the banner of the liberal labor party, and who got control of Parliament shortly after World War II and immediately put into effect the identical program Reuther's A.D.A. and C.O.P.E. are now proposing for us here in the U.S.A. To learn the facts about the suffering of the English people, especially the laboring people, the farmers and the small businessmen who suffered first and most at the hands of the Fabian Socialists makes the blood of any good American run cold. It must not happen here.

Democrats and Republicans are hoping—yes, praying—that Congress will hold the line against those who for selfish reasons are bringing concerted pressure on us to follow their anti-American liberal concepts. Every well informed, unbiased, American citizen knows that the true definition of a "modern Reuther liberal" is one who is primarily liberal with our constitutional rights and with our taxpayers' dollars.

Hence, under the circumstances as they now exist, were it not for my faith in you, Mr. Speaker, and in the good sense of most of my colleagues, I would shudder to contemplate the future of our blessed land. May God give us courage and the strength to meet the test, with the outspoken support of courageous men and women here in Congress and all over our broad land.

On this, the opening of the 86th Congress, I felt it in my heart to give expression—as I have here—to my innermost feelings, to be printed in the RECORD, that thousands, yea millions, might read and then do their part, and more, to preserve our precious American liberties.

Bombing Lawlessness Must Be Stopped

OF
HON. VICTOR L. ANFUSO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, January 9, 1959

Mr. ANFUSO. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, January 7, the opening day of the 86th Congress, I introduced my first bill of the new session. It is a bill calling for the most severe penalties for anyone bombing or attempting to bomb a house of worship, a school, a community center, or any other public building. I consider the recent wave of bomb terrorism a most serious situation which we cannot afford to tolerate, and for this reason, I feel we should adopt the most stringent means to prevent and to stop such terrorism in the future.

In October of 1958, when this wave of bombings of churches, synagogues, and schools began, I announced that I would have a bill ready for introduction at the beginning of the 86th Congress which would provide severe punishment for such crimes. The bill I introduced, if enacted into law, would amend title 18 of the United States Code relating to crimes and criminal procedures by adding a new section to chapter 39 which would provide for the following:

Whoever uses, or attempts to use, an explosive which has been imported into the United States, or which has been introduced, delivered for introduction, or transported in commerce, to damage or destroy a church, synagogue, school, community center, or other public building without the consent of the owner thereof shall be punished by imprisonment of not less than 20 years or by death.

The United States is the showcase of the world. The means of communication are such today that what we do here, good or bad, is reflected all over the world. If a synagogue or a church is bombed in any State of the Union, the criticism is directed not against the particular State for its refusal to abide by the law of the land but against the United States as a whole.

Dictators and tyrants all over the world use the incident to justify their own misdeeds, while the Communists play it up as a breakdown in law enforcement in America, as hypocrisy and insincerity toward freedom of religion, and as a clear demonstration that we are not to be trusted with the moral leadership of the world.

Recognizing the fact that one of the major differences between communism and the free world is over the issue of religion, we cannot afford to weaken our cause as the chief advocate of freedom of worship by failing to take all necessary precautions to prevent all such incidents in our own country.

While most crimes of this nature can be prevented or discouraged by long prison sentences, the right of the courts to impose the death penalty whenever warranted will act as a strong deterrent when dealing with fanatics and otherwise distorted individuals who are perfectly sane in the eyes of the law.

I strongly advocated and supported legislation calling for the death penalty in kidnaping cases and those involving dope peddlers who, for all intents and purposes, were killing children addicts of the drugs. The passage of death penalty laws to deal with such cases greatly reduced the extent of these crimes.

I feel certain that the passage of a similar law applicable to persons who place bombs in a church, synagogue, school, or other public building, endangering the lives of not one but of many people, will help put an end to this new form of lawlessness and direct attack on all free institutions.

Address by Vice President Nixon Before the English Speaking Union of the Commonwealth at the Guildhall in London

OF
HON. WILLIAM L. SPRINGER OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, January 9, 1959

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, during November the Vice President made a trip to England to represent the President of the United States on the occasion of the dedication of the American Chapel at St. Paul's Cathedral.

On that evening the Vice President addressed the English Speaking Union of the Commonwealth at the Guildhall in London. The Vice President made one of the best speeches of his career in explaining the responsibilities of English-speaking people in international affairs, both on home soil and abroad.

Mr. Speaker, this very thoughtful and enlightening speech is herewith appended in full:

TEXT OF ADDRESS OF THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA BEFORE THE ENGLISH SPEAKING UNION OF THE COMMONWEALTH, NOVEMBER 26, 1958, GUILDHALL, LONDON, ENGLAND

In the 6 years in which I have had the honor of serving as Vice President of the United States, it has been my privilege to visit many countries and to participate in many significant events. I can assure you that no occasion in that period will live more indelibly in my memory than the dedication of the American Chapel at St. Paul's which I attended this morning and the gathering in this historic hall which I am privileged to address this evening.

This meeting of the English Speaking Union dramatizes the enduring character of the friendship and alliance of our two countries. The activities of this organization have been most vital in cementing our bonds of comradeship.

I consider it a particular privilege to pay tribute to the thoughtful and inspiring leadership of His Royal Highness, Prince Philip, who has spared no sacrifices in this dedicated work. His recent visit to Canada was only one of many activities which indicate his vital interest.

You all may be justly proud, not only of the contribution you have made to better understanding between our two countries, but also the even greater work of building an enduring basis of friendship among all English-speaking peoples.

The dedication at St. Paul's this morning dramatizes the unity you have worked so hard to achieve. It was symbolic of the enduring ties that bind us. It brought to mind the dramatic events of earlier and more trying days—the magnificent leadership and the great sacrifices that made possible our victory in the Second World War.

Our thoughts went back to our great national leaders, Sir Winston Churchill and President Roosevelt, working together in intimate harmony. They will receive the ungrudging tribute of history for their capacity to marshal the forces of democracy.

Our thoughts turned also to our incomparable generals and admirals—Eisenhower and Montgomery, Cunningham and King. They were more than brilliant strategists and commanders. Because of their unwavering devotion to the concept that military ingenuity must be combined with recognition of civilian authority, they rank indeed among the great military leaders of all times.

But above all today we honored brave men, whose names are legion and whose sacrifices can never adequately be repaid. British and American—farmers and laborers, from cities and countryside, from offices and classrooms—these were the men who made possible our victory in the greatest war in history. Many events of that war will be forgotten as we turn our eyes to other tasks, but their deeds will live forever. They bequeathed to us a spirit, a sentiment, a national memory that will never fail to capture our admiration as we move side by side in the path of friendship and alliance.

As Abraham Lincoln said at Gettysburg, "The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced."

What is the unfinished work they leave for our generation? I believe that two American Presidents speaking in this same Guildhall have simply, but eloquently, answered that question.

Woodrow Wilson on December 28, 1918, said, "The peoples of the world want peace, and they want it now, not merely by conquest of arms, but by agreement of mind."

And Dwight D. Eisenhower, 27 years later on July 12, 1945 said "To preserve his freedom of worship, his equality before law, his liberty to speak and act as he sees fit subject only to provisions that he trespass not upon similar rights of others, a Londoner will fight. So will a citizen of Abilene."

To preserve freedom, to keep the peace, not only for themselves but for all people—this, then, is the cause for which the brave men we honored today gave their lives. It is the challenge and opportunity of our generation to further the ultimate realization of this noblest goal of mankind.

Let us examine the policies we should follow if this goal is to be attained. We begin by recognizing that the free world must be militarily stronger than any potential aggressor. The existence of our military strength and our determination and ability to maintain it are the basic elements without which the objectives we seek would be impossible to realize.

But we recognize that military strength in and of itself will not keep peace unless it is combined with a wise and judicious diplomatic policy. Let us see what some of the guidelines for our policy should be.

We must retain the armed strength needed for security in a troubled world, but we should speak with the calm assurance of those who are not afraid.

We know that to the extent the law of the jungle prevails in any area of the world, weakness and indecision lead to disaster. Yet, firmness is not and should not be arrogance.

We will shun assurances based merely upon naive hope or even self-deception. But we must never tire in our search for enforceable agreements which will reduce tension.

We know that little is lost by discussion but that all may be lost by war. Yet, even in our tireless striving for peace, we must always be prepared to say that freedom and the rights of man are even more ultimate values.

Above all, our policies must represent the best thinking the free world can produce. We are indeed fortunate in the fact that in men like Macmillan and De Gaulle, Adenauer and Spaak, Fanfani and Eisenhower we have the kind of dedicated and experienced leadership which is superbly qualified for the difficult task of keeping the peace with honor for the free world.

In this connection, I wish to pay special tribute to your Prime Minister for his initiative in developing the enlightened concept of interdependence which has proved so useful in bringing about closer understanding between our two nations and which points the way for improving consultation and cooperation among all the countries in the free world.

If the struggles for peace and freedom were to be decided solely by the adequacy of our military strength and by the quality of our diplomacy, we could look to the future with justifiable confidence as to the prospects for our eventual success. But we must recognize that this is only one phase of the struggle.

Our military strength and our diplomatic policies are designed to avoid a war we might otherwise have to fight in the future. We must not overlook the fact that other policies must be designed to avoid losing the nonmilitary battle which has already begun and which is being waged in many areas of the world today.

Let us examine the battleground where this conflict is taking place—in Asia, in the Near East, in Africa, and in parts of Latin America. A great revolution is taking place among the people in these areas of the world. What I refer to is not a military or political revolt, but the revolution of peoples' expectations, the assertion of all peoples of their claim to a greater share of this world's goods.

Millions of people in these newly developing nations are determined to break the bonds of wretchedness and poverty that have enslaved them through the centuries. They wish to achieve in this very generation a decisive breakthrough in the struggle against misery and disease.

They would prefer to attain these objectives and retain their freedom. But we must make no mistake about it, if they believe they are offered no other choice, they will choose progress even without freedom.

What is their choice? On the one hand, they have the example of the Soviet Union and the Communist satellites. Here is a pattern that promises quick results. Thousands of leaders of these countries are being invited to visit the Soviet Union to see the very real changes accomplished in the 40 years since the Communist revolution.

It is not an adequate answer to this challenge to cite the far higher material standards in most Western nations. To the newly developing nations of the world, this is not the point. They are not particularly impressed by achievements primarily accomplished in the century of the industrial revolution. They are far more interested in what can be accomplished in the last half of the 20th century.

What must be made clear and unmistakable for all the world to see is that free peoples can compete with and surpass totalitarian nations in producing economic progress. No people in the world today should be forced to choose between bread and freedom.

To shape the world of tomorrow in a pattern compatible with freedom and human rights we must all take our part in a great offensive against the evils of poverty, disease, and misery. We cannot, for example, afford to allow the free Government of India to fail in its heroic effort to produce economic progress and retain freedom at the same time.

We need to apply in this field the same determination, willingness, and cooperation which enabled us to build the military strength which deters aggression today.

We must not be miserly, smallminded, and negative in our approach to this problem. And while it is wrong to favor change solely because it is change, it is worse blindly to insist that we have nothing better to offer than maintaining the status quo.

We must associate ourselves with the decent aspirations of people everywhere for the better life to which they are entitled.

Just a few weeks ago, Premier Khrushchev promised his people a revolution in living standards within the next 12 years. He claimed that the Communist system would overtake and surpass the economies of the Western World.

We should be happy that such claims have been made. We would be eager to match the Soviet leaders in putting less emphasis upon armies, military research, and the costly lethal weapons of modern warfare, and more stress upon better housing, food, clothing, and the other necessities for a good life.

If Mr. Khrushchev wishes to consider these steps as a form of competition or contest, I am sure that all of us would be delighted to accept the challenge. In such a contest no one could really lose. The world would be infinitely better off if man's energies were used for the welfare of families rather than the building of armies.

But our answer to the Soviet challenge should not stop here. We say, broaden this competition and include the spiritual and cultural values that have distinguished our civilization.

Material achievements, while necessary, do not meet the deeper needs of mankind. Man needs the higher freedoms, freedom to know, to debate freely, to write and express his views.

He needs the freedom that law and justice guarantee to every individual so that neither privilege nor power may make any man subservient before the law.

He wants the freedom to travel and to learn from other peoples and cultures.

He wants freedom of worship.

To us, these are the most precious aspects of our civilization. We would be happy if others were to compete in this sphere and try to surpass our achievements.

The free world is too often made to appear to be relying on our superior military power and economic strength. It is not worthy of those with the heritage of freedom we share to appear to be resting our case on materialism alone.

I know of no better example to illustrate the point I am trying to make than through an analysis of that much-maligned institution—British colonialism. It is understandable in view of the surging rise of nationalism that we have heard all that is bad and little that is good about colonialism in the past few years.

Colonialism has had its faults, but it also has had its virtues. I speak from some knowledge on this subject. I have visited 12 countries which at one time or another have passed through the status of British colonialism.

I have known personally and admired the dedicated and effective work of your superb colonial administrators. You can indeed be proud of the contributions that have been made by men like Grantham in Hong Kong, Templer in Kuala Lumpur, MacDonald in Singapore, Crawford in Uganda, and Arden-Clark in Ghana.

Let us examine some of the benefits British colonial policy has produced in the areas in which it has operated. It brought the military strength which provided the security from external attack. It brought in many areas the technical training which assured economic progress.

But more important than either of these, it brought the great ideas which provided the basis for progress in the future, ideas which will live on for generations after the nations concerned have acquired the independent status for which an enlightened policy has prepared them.

The common law, the Parliament, the English language, freedom of speech, assembly, press, and religion, these are the institutions which are the proud legacy of the British people in lands throughout the world.

And so today let us never forget that in the momentous struggle in which we are engaged our major advantage is not in the strength of our arms or even the productivity of our factories. It is in the quality and power of the great ideals of freedom which have inspired men through the ages.

Our responsibility then is clear. Here is a cause worthy of the descendants of brave men and women who crossed boundless oceans and settled in every area of the globe.

Once again we must venture forth not to seek untilled lands, but rather to bring encouragement, aid, guidance, and partnership to those peoples who want to live in freedom and decent prosperity.

We come to them as friends, as brothers in a shrinking world. We do not seek to impose upon them our economic system or our culture. It is theirs to choose the path to the future. But it is our responsibility to see that this choice is an informed one and a free one.

Let it never be said that because of our failure to present adequately the aims and ideals of freedom others chose the often irreversible path of dictatorship.

Let us speak less of the threat of communism and more of the promise of freedom.

Let us adopt as our primary objective not the defeat of communism but the victory of plenty over want, of health over disease, of freedom over tyranny.

With such a goal we shall give the lie to those who proclaim that we are witnessing the twilight of a dying Western civilization. Rather we shall see the onset of a glorious dawn of a new world based on the immortal ideals for which men have sacrificed their lives through the ages.

In this very hall, a century and a half ago an English Prime Minister gave a brief address that has been ranked by Lord Curzon as one of the indisputable masterpieces of English eloquence. After the news of Nelson's glorious victory at Trafalgar, William

Pitt was toasted as the savior of Europe. He responded in these words: "I return you many thanks for the honor you have done me. But Europe is not to be saved by any single man. England has saved herself by her exertions and will as I trust save Europe by her example."

Here is a challenge worthy of the brave men we honored today. May we, the English-speaking peoples, proud in the heritage we share, join with the friends of freedom everywhere and by our example save the cause of peace and freedom for the world.

Tax on Long-Term Capital Gains

OF
HON. JAMES B. UTT
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, January 9, 1959

Mr. UTT. Mr. Speaker, it is my firm conviction that revision in our tax structure is a must if we are to encourage the individual capital investment so necessary for providing jobs for our ever-increasing working force.

The amount of new risk capital required to keep our economy healthy at any given time is obviously related to population—to the demographic facts of births, deaths, longevity, retirement, and other germane matters over a period of time. As I read the figures, it now requires over $15,000 of new risk capital to bring one new little job into the world. An examination of the available data on babies growing up and wanting jobs, on automation's replacement of old jobs with more costly new ones, and on inflation's toll on the cost of maintaining and replacing wornout or obsolete machinery, it would seem that we now need annually not only over $40 billion of new risk capital to meet our new job needs, but also at least another $40 billion of new capital each year to keep in good repair the tools of the jobs we already have.

This new capital can come directly or indirectly, from only one source—the invested savings of the individual citizen. And high taxes and unwise taxes which impede incentives to thrift, savings and investment, pose a serious threat to economic growth and full employment.

On the other hand, I well realize the fiscal plight of a Federal Treasury faced with a budget deficit of $8 billion and the inflationary consequences that might result at this time from intemperate tax reduction schemes that would merely shift our tax burdens from one group to another and thereby stifle economic growth and further choke off the reservoir from which all taxes must be paid—the excess margin of real productivity over consumption, which we call savings.

Nevertheless, there is one area of Fedral tax reform which would go far toward encouraging equity investment in new and small businesses, creating new job opportunities and providing additional revenues to the Federal Government. This area exists in that portion of our Revenue Code which deals with taxation of so-called long-term capital gains. To begin with, this tax is a very poor revenue producer because of its voluntary nature and because of its unrealistic high rate.

It is my firm belief that this is an unwise, and an unfair tax. It is largely a levy on capital and not on income. It penalizes elderly owners of homes and farms who wish to sell and retire into smaller and less expensive quarters. It penalizes owners of investments who wish gradually to shift their holdings into more conservative securities as they gradually attain their less productive years. It prevents many constructive business transactions that would be in the public interest, especially the ability of small and weaker enterprises to merge with stronger organizations rather than be forced to discontinue operations which provide our citizens with jobs. And last, but not least, it has sterilized vast pools of risk capital, substantial portions of which otherwise would find their way into risk investment in new and small business ventures and thereby afford vast new employment opportunities, new productive capacity, and new sources of tax revenues to the Treasury.

It is for these reasons that I am introducing today a resolution which provides that the alternate rate of tax on long-term capital gains be reduced from 25 percent to 12½ percent.

It is my firm conviction that this bill is a revenue producing measure.

If this tax rate were so changed, investment in our economic system would receive substantial encouragement, new jobs would be created and the Treasury would actually gain revenues as a result thereof. After all, no one has to sell his capital assets, but a great many would willingly do so if the tax rate were made more realistic.

I welcome the bipartisan support of my colleagues in bringing this bill to early committee consideration, separate and apart from other revenue measures. I am sure the evidence produced before them at the attendant hearings will convince them of the wisdom of enacting this legislation.

Bills Designed To Empower the U.S. Government To Deal With Certain Crimes of Violence

OF
HON. JOHN V. LINDSAY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, January 9, 1959

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced today, January 9, a group of seven bills designed to empower the Federal Government to deal with crimes of violence such as hate-bombings, hate-mail, and threats directed at, or attempts to intimidate, Federal officers in the performance of their duties. These bills are substantially identical to a group of bills which the Honorable JACOB K. JAVITS and the Honorable KENNETH B. KEATING have advised me they intend to introduce in the Senate today. I wish to express here my wholehearted accord with those honorable gentlemen in the policy which these bills seek to effectuate. There may appear, upon committee examination and exegesis, the need for some technical revisions in some of these proposals in the interest of conformity to established Federal criminal law patterns. Such changes as may be necessary will not, I am sure, derogate from the fundamental thrust of these bills in the prevention and punishment of a program of conduct which has shocked and revolted us all.

Former Senator Davis Elkins, of West Virginia

OF
HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, January 9, 1959

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, former U.S. Senator Davis Elkins, of West Virginia, died today from an extended illness. Death came in his sleep at a hospital in Richmond, Va., where he had been a patient.

With the death of Senator Elkins there passed from the industrial scene of West Virginia one of the last of a long list of pioneers in the development of much of the natural wealth of the State. The former U.S. Senator Stephen B. Elkins, father of Davis Elkins, had collaborated with former U.S. Senator Henry Gassaway Davis, his father-in-law, in processing and marketing timber and coal and in building many of the original railroads of the State.

It was from the late Stephen B. Elkins that the city of Elkins received its name.

Senator Elkins is survived by his widow, three children and six grandchildren. His children are Mrs. Charles J. Kelly (Katherine), of New York City; Davis Elkins, Jr., of Elkins, W. Va.; and Mrs. A. Thomas Zirpolo (Maureen), of Cleveland, Ohio.

The family has been active in Republican politics in West Virginia and the Nation for three-quarters of a century.

Davis Elkins was born in Washington, D.C., in 1876 while his father was serving as a Delegate in the United States Congress representing the Territory of New Mexico. His mother, the former Hallie Davis, daughter of the then U.S. Senator Henry Gassaway Davis, met and married his father when he came to Washington as a Congressional Delegate.

He attended Lawrenceville, N.J., preparatory school; Phillips Academy, Andover, Mass.; and Harvard University.

He was a veteran of the Spanish-American War, having served as a first lieutenant with Company E of the First West Virginia Volunteer Infantry. He reentered the active service of his country during World War I and served as a major in Europe. It was during his service in the Army that he was elected to the United States Senate from West Virginia in November of 1918. He did not seek reelection at the conclusion of his term in 1925.

Upon leaving the U.S. Senate, Senator Elkins undertook the active management of his coal and timber holdings, principally in northern West Virginia. He actively pursued this interest until his retirement due to ill health several years ago.

He had helped shape the Republican Party activities at the end of World War I and had played an important role in the party's financing during the period from 1920 until his health no longer permitted his active participation.

It was upon this withdrawal from a leading role that his wife, Mary R. Elkins, began to represent him in active participation on the political stage and was sent from their home Congressional District in West Virginia as a delegate to the 1952 Republican National Convention. Following that Mrs. Elkins was twice a candidate for Congress in the Second District.

The Elkins family has been one of the political and social leaders in the Nation since Stephen B. Elkins came to Washington in the 1870's. During the period of Davis Elkins' business career in West Virginia, he also maintained a home in Washington and most of the Nation's political leaders were frequent guests with him and his family.

The Davis and Elkins College in Elkins, W. Va., was an original joint gift to the Presbyterian Church by the two families who had lived in and developed that part of the State. Their original homes still serve as dormitories on the campus of the school.

Funeral arrangements are incomplete, but the body will be interred in the family plot at Elkins.

Francis E. Walter, Chairman of the Special International Meeting on Refugees Held in Geneva, Switzerland

OF
HON. WAYNE N. ASPINALL OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, January 9, 1959

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, during my most recent visit in Geneva, Switzerland, I was extremely happy to attend, on November 20, 1958, a special international meeting on refugees held by representatives of 29 governments immediately upon the termination of the ninth session of the Council of the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration—ICEM.

Mr. Marcus Daly, the director of ICEM, stressed that the meeting convened at the suggestion of the U.S. Government for the purpose of exploring the present status of those refugees in Western Europe who, for a variety of reasons, have been so far unable to find new homes in the countries of resettlement.

I am informed that the result of the debates held in Geneva, as well as the results of the studies presently in progress, will be the subject of a special report to the House. Such report will be submitted at a later date, I understand, when the studies and statistical compilations are available. At the present time, however, it gives me great pleasure to submit to the attention of my colleagues that part of the proceedings of the special international meeting on refugees which pertain to the nomination and the unanimous election to the chair of our colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER].

Under leave to insert my remarks in the RECORD, I hereby submit the verbatim transcript of the pertinent part of the Geneva proceedings.

Upon the conclusion of Mr. Daly's opening remarks, the delegate of Australia obtained the floor:

Mr. JOCKEL (Australia). Mr. Director, gentlemen. As you said, Mr. Director, this is a meeting of a very special character, called by the United States or, rather, suggested by the United States, to take advantage of the presence of the representatives who are here in Geneva. It is not in the formal sense an ICEM meeting and indeed when we look around the room and we see the governments assembled, the United Nations High Commissioner's Office, the Voluntary Agencies, rather would they be considered as representing a community of countries and organizations interested in refugee work. In this room this morning we have many men with special responsibilities in their governments for migration and refugee questions and among such a group of top-level and influential people a discussion of the remaining refugee problems and an assembly of the facts and information relating to these problems can do nothing but good in sustaining and expanding international effort.

Among us this morning we have a very distinguished gentleman who is especially well equipped by knowledge, experience and authority to direct these deliberations. It is indeed our good fortune to have with us Congressman FRANCIS E. WALTER, the chairman of the United States congressional delegation to the just-concluded ICEM Council. We believe we should take advantage of his presence and his interest in this work and it is my pleasure to nominate Congressman WALTER to preside over this meeting. The United States delegation has kindly offered to make his services available for this purpose.

It is not necessary for me to dwell upon the contribution that Congressman WALTER has made to the work of ICEM, which has, itself made such a contribution to the solution of refugee problems. He continues to be a tower of strength to the organization and my country is by no means the least to appreciate what his support means for ICEM and in related matters. I feel I should, however, place before you some indication of Congressman WALTER'S unflagging work in the refugee field in the last decade. For every United States legislation concerning refugees and migrants since the war, Congressman WALTER, in Congress, has been the author and the pilot. This extends from the Displaced Persons Act in 1948, through which 460,000 persons were admitted to the United States, the Refugee Relief Act providing for a further 110,000 admissions, right down to recent legislation for the admission of Dutch expellees. It includes also the 1957 legislation providing for the liberalization of the entry laws in immigrant cases involving sicknesses and diseases, thereby facilitating family reunions and the admission of refugees.

Generous ideas and practices have a way of spreading; the example of what the United States is doing and has done in this area is not lost on other governments and indeed there has seldom been a period of such constructive general effort in the refugee field. I am sure that you will all agree that to appoint as chairman today one of the greatest architects of this international work would be the best basis we could, in this meeting, have for further fruitful effort. Thank you, Mr. Director.

Mr. HAVEMANN (Netherlands). Mr. Director, it is a great privilege to me to support the proposal just made by the Australian representative. All of us know how much we owe to Mr. WALTER in the field of refugees and migration. With his great prestige and political leadership he has very successfully directed his efforts to helping many countries, many groups of refugees and innumerable individuals to alleviate or to solve their problems. It is right that we should ask him to take the chair, not only as an expression of our gratitude but still more because we badly need his guidance in our endeavors to deal effectively with the refugee problem. As a leading and outstanding politician, Mr. WALTER is not always easy to convince; he has a sound dose of skepticism which prevents him from believing in what he is accustomed to call international social workers pipedreams. But I have already noted many times that once Mr. WALTER is convinced of the urgency of a matter he kneads the circumstances like wax until the solution he has in mind is reached. For this reason I hope the nations represented here will call on Mr. WALTER to act as their leader and maybe in a later stage their trustee. I am certain that we can then hope to reach a solution of our problems pretty soon. Thank you.

Mr. DE LIERA (Spain) (translation from Spanish). Mr. Chairman, I wished to address the meeting for the express purpose of supporting the proposal of the representative of Australia but my colleague, the delegate of the Netherlands, anticipated my intention. I should now like to associate myself with that proposal by saying that I consider that the background and exceptional ability possessed by Mr. WALTER make him the most suitable person to preside over the meeting called for this morning. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. RIVAS (Venezuela) (translation from Spanish). Mr. Chairman, the delegation of Venezuela has very great pleasure in supporting the proposal made by the representative of Australia, seconded by the representatives of the Netherlands and of Spain, that Congressman WALTER should be chairman of this special meeting on refugees.

In point of fact, my delegation is well acquainted with the efforts made by Mr. WALTER not only on behalf of expellees, but also on behalf of all the migrants in order to help them to build up a prosperous existence at the same time to contribute to the development of many countries which need the cooperation offered by these human resources. Thank you.

Mr. FALCHI (Italy) (translation from French). Mr. Chairman, I should like to give my wholehearted support to the proposal just made. The Director has told us of the importance of this meeting; we are most interested in this problem and we hope that the discussions which are about to take place will be successful. I firmly believe that there is no one who is better qualified than Mr. WALTER, by his experience and authority to preside over our work and to strengthen our hopes of achieving concrete results. In consequence, I associate myself wholeheartedly with the proposal which has been made to entrust the chair to Mr. WALTER.

Mr. DALY. I would like to thank the delegates for their remarks. Are there any further remarks? Has any other representative the wish to put forward another candidate for the office of chairman? (No response.) It would appear to be the wish of this meeting that Congressman WALTER be, and he is, unanimously elected to be chairman. [Applause.] I should like to introduce our new chairman, Congressman WALTER.

Mr. WALTER (delegate of the United States). Gentlemen, in the first instance I wish to state that I deeply appreciate the very nice things that have been said about me and may I add, I trust that they will not go unnoticed by my potential political opponents in some forthcoming election campaign back home. In a more serious vein, I assure you that the purpose of this meeting is one that should stir all of us to attempt a solution of a problem that will become increasingly difficult unless solved early.

Up to now ICEM has been successfully dealing with the results of the failure to recognize a problem caused by overpopulation. I am sure that the nations of the world that are participating in an attempt to bring about a solution to that problem recognize the fact that there is another one which must be dealt with as intelligently as this great organization of ICEM dealt with the one presented to it in Brussels in 1951 when the organization was created.

I am sure that all will realize that this is merely, may I say, an exploratory meeting. First, I think it is extremely important that we know exactly what the problem is and the extent of the problem before us. After we realize just exactly what that is, then, of course, whatever steps must be taken can be taken intelligently.

I am sure that all of us are very much in the dark as to just exactly what the size and the nature of the "residual refugees" problem is, and I am sure that this informal meeting, attended by everyone who has exhibited an interest in this matter, will bear fruit. The Chair recognizes the representative of the United States to explain the position of the United States. Mr. O'Connor.

Statement by Hon. Walter H. Moeller of Ohio

OF
HON. WALTER H. MOELLER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, January 9, 1959

Mr. MOELLER. Mr. Speaker, on this, the second time that I have been present on the floor of the House as a Member of this distinguished body, I think it fitting to give voice to a few of the sentiments which have been in my mind and heart during the past few days, sentiments which I hope and pray will color and in a sense guide my future actions as the elected Representative of the people of the 10th Congressional District of Ohio.

First and foremost I am deeply grateful to Almighty God for having been granted the honor and entrusted with the solemn duty of helping to guide the destiny of this great Nation in these epochal times. With His constant help I shall do my utmost to prove myself worthy of that trust and to redeem the pledge that I have given to my constituents and to the whole people of the United States.

I feel also a strong sense of obligation to the voters and indeed to all of the citizens of the 10th Ohio District. I take this moment to assure each and every one of them that my door and my heart will always be open to them. Their legitimate concerns and their problems, great or small, will come first with me, either at home or here in the Nation's Capital. I ask only that they not spare me the opportunity to serve them.

I reflect also on the high privilege of being one of the chosen few to occupy these Chambers, dignified by history, by time, by the distinguished and even illustrious Members of years past, and made even more distinguished by the spirit of generations past, present, and to come which we feel in the atmosphere about us. Without thought of sacrilege I can honestly say that it is almost as though I were experiencing a second ordination. Only my life's calling as a member of the clergy can be said to have made me feel the depth of emotion and the feeling of consecration to a holy cause which now hold me, in my head and in my heart. Pray God that this spirit will abide with me always and that I do not lose it in the days and months to come.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to trespass upon the patience of my colleagues with more than these few words. I have spoken from a full heart and I pledge that whatever I may say from this floor in the future it will always be said in the same Christian spirit and with the same respect for truth and for the rights and feelings of my colleagues, my constituents, and the whole of humanity of whatever color or creed.

Depressed Areas Legislation

OF
HON. JOHN LESINSKI
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, January 9, 1959

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, among the 40 bills I introduced on January 7 was H.R. 830 to establish a program of Federal assistance to those areas which suffer from persistent economic depressions, an area redevelopment program.

In essence my proposal is similar to the legislation that was considered and approved by the 85th Congress.

I was shocked and amazed last year when President Eisenhower refused to sign the depressed areas bill, because the need for that type of legislation is clearly indicated. As I pointed out last year, when one segment of the Nation suffers economically, the entire country is affected. The depressed areas are not isolated islands, alone in a wide ocean with no ties to the mainland; they, like the other sections of our country should be contributing their share to the continuing prosperity of the Nation. These contributions would be not only for the benefit of the total economy but also to the Federal Government which is losing great potentials from individuals and businesses in such areas, and, in addition, is faced with increased costs of unemployment compensation and welfare aid.

It is true that the country appears to be recovering from the depression of last year. However, the picture in Michigan continues to loom dark and foreboding. Last year the unemployment rate was 15.4 percent of the labor force; this year it is being predicted that one worker in eight, or 12.5 percent, will be unemployed all through 1959. One certainly cannot view that situation as recovery. I am sure this condition is repeated in the other major depressed areas in the country.

An area redevelopment program is insurance in the future of America; it will pay rich dividends by aiding the growth and prosperity of this great Nation of ours. I urge the Committee on Banking and Currency and the Congress to take immediate favorable action on this legislation.

Charity Begins at Home

OF
HON. EUGENE SILER
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, January 9, 1959

Mr. SILER. Mr. Speaker, charity begins at home. Who first said it, I do not know. Maybe it was out of the wisdom of King Solomon. But anyhow that old saying has always been a sparkling proverb of everlasting truth in my book and in the books of many others.

Way up in Harlan County, Ky., is a valley called Clover Fork, where I did some visiting this past December. But right now all the bloom is off the clover on Clover Fork. And no one is knee deep or even ankle deep in clover anymore up there. It is a narrow vale of mining camp dejection at present. The men look right at you out of solemn and desolate eyes. The women speak a silent, mournful language that says, "Yes, the hope is all gone but we still keep a brave front for the sake of our families." The children, the perennial chatterboxes of cheer, still hula their plastic hoops and blow their bubble gum full of air pockets. And the Kentucky cardinals still flash their bright colors in the native bushes on the mountainsides. And, too, the waters of the creek still gurgle their cheerful optimism as they roll over rough rocks, yet these waters seem to hasten along as if hurrying to leave forever Clover Fork Valley and its sad plague of poverty.

I look at that man over there with the miner's light cap and with shoulders considerably stooped by a thousand bent-over trips through low-room necks and narrow airways and long entries inside the dark, damp mines. And then I ask along with the great poet, "Is this the thing the Lord God made and gave to have dominion over sea and land; to trace the stars and search the heavens for power; to feel the passion of eternity? What to him are Plato and the swing of Pleiades? What the long reaches of the peaks of song, the rift of dawn, the reddening of the rose?" Well, enough of poetry. It is poverty, not poetry, that is claiming our attention just now.

It was exactly 2 weeks and 2 days before Christmas, but the season failed somehow. Because the bloom was off the clover; the berries were off the Christmas holly. Whenever the people are worrying over coffee and pork chops, all the Santa Claus business in the world is merely as a sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. There is just no harmony from it or jingle in it.

I stepped inside the dark hot room filled with several people and many odors. Someone with me said in a cheerful voice, "This is your Congressman come to see you." No one stirred. No one spoke. The introduction was flat. If Ike himself had come in, maybe someone would have gotten up and said, "Here, take a chair." But I have some doubt about that. The mind was on the unseen "vittles," on the unknown job out yonder in the beautiful and prosperous valley of somewhere. I tried to sound something of a hopeful note and to lift their spirits just a little bit, but I was a considerable amount of nothing and their gaze was still on the floor as I left the house. God help me. I could not raise their souls one bit. I was a failure at that undertaking. But somehow I do not believe my country nor its people would want to fail that vale up yonder on Clover Fork in Harlan County.

I am right now more interested in this valley's Evarts than Estonia and more concerned over this valley's Verda than Venezuela. It is just human nature. Maybe it is nearsightedness that makes a fellow see the thin seat of his neighbor's pants before he ever sees a faraway Arab needing a new pair of sandals for the desert road. I guess this Congressman from southeast Kentucky is just a little nearsighted.

Mr. Speaker, in my book, charity begins at home.

Panama Canal Zone: Constitutional Domain of the United States

OF

HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 9, 1959

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, during the second session of the last Congress starting on March 26, 1958, I made a series of addresses dealing with various phases of Canal Zone diplomatic and legislative history and problems. Though the writings on these subjects are voluminous and at first sight bewildering, when reduced to their essentials they are relatively simple.

At the request of Maj. Gen. U. S. Grant 3d, president of the American Peace Society, I undertook to condense into a brief article for the fall 1958 issue of "World Affairs," the quarterly magazine of that organization, the basic points in the Canal Zone sovereignty question.

The article follows:

PANAMA CANAL ZONE: CONSTITUTIONAL DOMAIN OF THE UNITED STATES

(By Honorable DANIEL J. FLOOD, Representative from Pennsylvania)

SUEZ CRISIS FOCUSED ATTENTION ON PANAMA

The dramatic but "legally unjustifiable"[1] nationalization by Egypt on July 26, 1956, of the Suez Canal was an epochal event. It has focused world attention on the other great interocean waterway, the Panama Canal, to a degree not equaled since those memorable years near the start of this century when the key canal treaties, under which it was constructed and subsequently maintained and operated, were negotiated.

Originating in the Soviet Union and its satellites, the ensuing clamor has been featured by voluminous propaganda aimed at wresting ownership and control of the Panama Canal from the United States and transferring its jurisdiction to some international or other authority. This uproar, instead of tending to clarify and stabilize conditions on the American isthmus, has formed a sinister agitation that conforms to the well-known pattern of penetration and subversion so characteristic of the tactics of the international Communist conspiracy for world conquest. Moreover, the din is today being fanned by jingoistic elements in Panama, including high officials in the government of that Republic and has created a situation that is definitely hazardous.

Meanwhile, a widespread ignorance of the most elemental facts in canal history, prolonged silence by our government with respect to the rights and responsibilities of the United States at the isthmus,[2] and its weak policies of appeasement and giveaway, together have served to aggravate the situation, which truly needs rigorous clarification.

JURIDICAL BASE FOR ISTHMIAN CANAL POLICIES

Rooted in four centuries of history,[3] the foundations of the United States Isthmian canal policies find expression in three important canal treaties:

First. The Hay-Pauncefote Treaty of 1901 between Great Britain and the United States, which facilitated construction of an isthmian canal across Central America. In this treaty, Great Britain relinquished its own rights for the construction and control of such canal and recognized the exclusive right of the United States thereto. The United States, in assuming this responsibility, adopted the main points in the Convention of Constantinople of 1888, concerning the Suez Canal, as rules of the operation, and regulation of the American canal.

Second. The Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty of November 18, 1903, between the Republic of Panama and the United States. On the part of Panama, this treaty granted to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation and control of the Canal Zone for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation and protection of the Panama Canal, and, most significantly, as if the United States were the sovereign of the territory and to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority. On the part of the United States, the main point for the purposes of this paper was that it guaranteed the independence of the Republic of Panama, which had just seceded from Colombia and whose existence depended on the protection of the United States and the success of the canal undertaking.

Third. The Thompson-Urrutia Treaty of April 6, 1914, proclaimed March 30, 1922, between the United States and the Republic of Colombia, the sovereign of the isthmus prior to the Panama Revolution of November 3, 1903. This treaty aimed at removal of all misunderstandings growing out of political events in Panama in November 1903, restoration of the cordial relationship that had previously existed between Colombia and the United States, and definition of their rights and interests with respect to the Canal and the Panama Railroad.

The negotiation of these three treaties, it should be emphasized, was not accidental. Instead, it was the result of long-range interoceanic canal policies of the United States developed over many years and having in mind always the history of the affected territory.

Here, as a matter of special interest, it should be remarked that the Panama Railroad, running through the Canal Zone and constituting the first American transcontinental rail system and the first practical step in the construction of the canal, was built by United States citizens in 1849–55. Later, it was acquired by the French, and sold to the United States as part of the French canal holdings acquired in 1904.

Throughout the period of United States operation of the canal, the requirements of these treaties have been carefully followed. Their main provisions have stood the test of experience and fully justify their adoption. They form a splendid monument to those who evolved them, and today Public Law 841, 81st Congress (1950), governing the administration of the canal enterprise and popularly known as the Thompson Act, actually mentions these treaties and specifies that the levy of tolls is subject to their provisions.

PEAK OF U.S. ISTHMIAN INFLUENCE, 1903–39

Following the independence of Panama in 1903, the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty was negotiated with the new sovereign of the Isthmus, instead of Colombia, pursuant to the Spooner Act of June 28, 1902, that had authorized negotiation of a treaty for canal purposes with Colombia.

As previously stated, this treaty authorized the acquisition and perpetual control of the Canal Zone for the primary objectives of constructing the Panama Canal and its perpetual maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection, all exclusively by the United States and also wholly at U.S. expense.

In addition, it is also clear from the diplomatic and legislative history of that era that the aim of both the United States and Panama was to establish and maintain complete sovereignty over the Canal Zone by the United States. This was done not only to assure the construction, efficient operation, and protection of the Canal in perpetuity, as provided in the Spooner Act of 1902 and in the 1903 treaty, but also to guarantee that Colombia could never be able to reassert successfully its sovereignty over the Canal Zone, the Panama Canal, the Panama Railroad, or the Republic of Panama.

which the independence of Panama resulted, and the provisions of the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty, the Republic of Panama would never have been created and could never have survived. Besides, the United States would never have undertaken construction of a project as vast as the Panama Canal in a region then justly described as the pesthole of the world and long characterized as a land of endemic revolution repeatedly requiring the presence of naval vessels to maintain freedom of transisthmian transit.[4]

These points were fully understood at that time by Panamanian as well as North American leaders. Both realized that political stability in the Isthmian area was imperative for the success of the Canal enterprise—its construction and subsequent maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection. They also recognized that such stability could be obtained only by vesting complete and exclusive sovereignty over the Canal Zone in the United States.

The great North American statesman who developed our Isthmian policies included such eminent leaders as President Theodore Roosevelt, John Hay, John Bassett Moore, Adm. John G. Walker, William Howard Taft, and Elihu Root. President Roosevelt always viewed the Canal as the greatest accomplishment of his administration, and comparable in importance to the Louisiana Purchase. In essence, the results of their vision and efforts remained unimpaired until 1939—a period now recognized as the peak of United States influence on the isthmus.

COLOMBIA'S INTEREST PROTECTED BY TREATY

Because of the importance of the Thompson-Urrutia Treaty, and the fact that it is not as well known as it should be, its principal provisions are summarized.

In article I, Colombia recognizes the title to the Panama Canal and Panama Railroad as "vested entirely and absolutely in the United States, without any encumbrances or indemnities whatever." Furthermore, this article provides that Colombia shall enjoy certain rights, which include:

First. Transit through the Canal of Colombian troops, materials of war, and ships of war, without paying charges to the United States.

Second. Exemption of charges on products of Colombian soil and industry, as well as mails, other than those to which the products and mails of the United States are subject.

Third. Exemption of Colombian citizens, crossing the isthmus, from every toll, tax, or duty to which the citizens of the United States are not subject.

Fourth. Use of the Panama Railroad or any other railroad substituting therefor, in event of interruption of transit, for the transport of troops, materials of war, products, and mails of Colombia on the same basis as those of the United States.

In article II, the United States agreed to pay Colombia $25 million, which was done.

By article III, Colombia recognized Panama as an independent nation and agreed to conclude a treaty of peace and friendship and to establish regular diplomatic relations, all of which was accomplished together with a treaty agreement between the two countries as to their common boundary.

Thus, it is clear that Colombia not only has substantial rights with respect to the Canal, but also a treaty interest in the continued operation of the Panama Railroad, which is binding on the United States. As will be later shown, this treaty interest of Colombia in 1955 was overlooked or ignored in the formulation of the treaty between the United States and Panama of that year.

[1] FLOOD, "Panama Canal Zone: Constitutional Domain of the United States—Further Supplementary," CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 104, Apr. 2, 1958, lists many incidents of isthmian turmoil.

TREATY POWER UNDERMINES UNITED STATES AUTHORITY

With the passing of the years after opening the canal to traffic on August 15, 1914, the operation of the project became a matter of routine with decreased public interest and scrutiny in the United States and Colombia. In Panama, however, there developed determined efforts toward securing revision of major provisions in the treaty structure.

Thoughtful North American officials, stationed in the Canal Zone as early as 1931–32, recognized the dangers involved and expressed fear that such treaty revision might lead to the ultimate loss of exclusive control of the canal by the United States.

Not until 1936, however, was the first major step in this direction made with the signing of the Hull-Alfaro Treaty. This treaty, because of opposition in the Senate, was not proclaimed until July 27, 1939.

The Hull-Alfaro Treaty, unlike the 1903 treaty, was negotiated without authorization or direction by the Congress. It weakened the dike in the diplomatic setup of the Panama Canal, but without impairment of the fundamental principle of its exclusive sovereign control by the United States.

To understand better its important provisions, it should be borne in mind that, by the time of the 1936 treaty, Panamanian leaders felt, because of the 1914 treaty between the United States and Colombia, that their country's independence was secure. Thus, they sought and secured abrogation of the guarantee provision of the 1903 treaty together with the right of the United States to maintain order in the terminal cities. In addition, the 1936 treaty surrendered other important rights of the United States granted in the 1903 treaty, including the important right of the United States of eminent domain within the Republic of Panama for canal purposes, and raised the canal annuity from $250,000 to $430,000 to compensate for the devaluation of the gold dollar, all without consideration except of token character.

The crippling of United States accessory powers, however, did not stop there. After prolonged secret negotiations started in 1953, the process was advanced much further in the Eisenhower-Remon Treaty, proclaimed August 26, 1955, also negotiated without the authorization, direction, or suggestion by the Congress. This treaty gave to Panama additional valuable properties worth many millions and substantial rights, the latter including the authority of the United States to enforce sanitary ordinances in the terminal cities of Panama and Colon, which rights had been indispensable to building the canal. Moreover, the 1955 treaty increased the annuity by $1.5 million, from $430,000 specified in the 1936 treaty to $1,930,000.

The Congress, in implementing this treaty, did not accept the additional $1,500,000 as a charge on the Panama Canal enterprise but as foreign aid to Panama accorded by the Department of State as a diplomatic gesture. Thus, the annuity of $1,930,000 is now being carried as an item in the budget of that Department, with reimbursement for $430,000 of it to the Treasury, chargeable to the Panama Canal Company. This means that the annual cost of this diplomatic move ($1,500,000) is borne by U.S. taxpayers and not canal users, further illustrating the propensity of the State Department to give away tax money for purposes of political placation. What a paradox is thus presented and what a dangerous precedent for the future administration of the Panama Canal.

Because all the 1955 treaty benefits and surrenders to Panama were extended for no other than purely token considerations, their costs ultimately will have to be covered by either increased taxes or higher tolls. Furthermore, they have definitely weakened the police power of the United States in meeting its treaty responsibilities for the maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the canal—a situation that might well prove fatal for the proper conduct of the canal enterprise in the future.

PANAMA RAILROAD LIQUIDATION NARROWLY AVERTED

One of the most objectionable features of the 1955 treaty was its surrender to Panama of valuable Panama Railroad property in the cities of Panama and Colon, even including the terminal freight yards and passenger station but excepting tracks in Colon necessary for Cristobal pier switching. Not only that, the treaty actually contemplated without the authority of the Congress the abandonment of the railroad itself, which, as shown previously, had been acquired with adequate compensation by the United States pursuant to both law and treaty. In addition, this move appears to have been taken with complete disregard or ignorance of the treaty rights of Colombia with respect to the Panama Railroad.

Apprised of the situation, congressional leaders intervened. An independent congressional inquiry[5] resulted in the reversal of the formal endeavor of the Directorate of the Panama Canal Company to liquidate the railroad—a congressional decision fully justified by subsequent operation of the railroad. This action, however, was too late to save the terminal facilities of this historic and strategic rail line.

Now where does this leave us? Because the treaty has no provision for replacement of the ceded facilities, we are going to have a transisthmian railroad without its originally designed and adequate terminal yards and stations. Could there be anything more absurd, or more ominous for the future conduct of our isthmian policies?

CANAL ZONE IS CONSTITUTIONAL TERRITORY OF THE UNITED STATES

The sustained surrenders of our isthmian rights and prerogatives, designed for proper maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the canal, extend beyond the limits of the Canal Zone into the very foundation of our constitutional form of government.

The acquisition of the Canal Zone and Panama Railroad was accomplished with adequate compensation pursuant to the Spooner Act of 1902 and the 1903 Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty. Constructed and subsequently managed according to laws enacted by the Congress, the canal enterprise symbolizes to the people of the United States the productive benefits to be derived from our system of government.

Long recognized as part of the "coastline of the United States," the Canal Zone is not an occupied territory,[6] as was once erroneously reported to the United Nations by our Department of State, but a portion of the constitutionally acquired territory of the United States.

BASIC ISTHMIAN POLICIES MUST BE REAFFIRMED

Unfortunately, the tragic surrenders culminating in the present isthmian crisis represent a threat to our national power. In fact, the course pursued has resulted in the surrender without justification of our bargaining rights with Panama. It has created a situation that will require statesmanship of the highest order on the part of both Panama and the United States to correct.

[5] H. Rept. 2974, 84th Cong.

[6] Senate Hearings on Interlocking Subversion in Government Departments, pt. 19, Mar. 25, 1954, p. 1364.

In approaching this complicated task our leaders must realize that they are not dealing with a routine matter but one of transcendent importance for the indefinite future. History has shown that the canal question cannot safely be entrusted to minor negotiating officials of the executive departments alone but must be forthrightly faced by the Congress, which, as the ultimate authority, should reaffirm our canal policies in the light of all the basic considerations and realities involved.

The great lesson to be derived from a critical study of more than a century of experience in matters affecting security of transit, and the protection of the canal itself, is the imperative necessity for political stability on the isthmus, with no dilution or diminution of United States sovereignty and control over the Panama Canal enterprise.

Reduction of Premium Rates for FHA Insurance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LESTER HOLTZMAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, January 9, 1959

Mr. HOLTZMAN. Mr. Speaker, since February of 1955 I have had legislation before the House of Representatives providing for a reduction of the premium rates for FHA insurance on cooperative housing to one-fourth of 1 percent.

In June 1955 the Housing and Home Finance Agency reported unfavorably on my bill, H.R. 4443 to the Committee on Banking and Currency; and again in August of 1957 the Agency recommended that the bill, H.R. 8674 not be enacted.

At that time I had pointed out that it was obvious that the 213 cooperatives were in serious financial difficulty because of circumstances over which they had absolutely no control. Section 213 of the Housing Act was originally designed to alleviate critical shortage of housing for the middle income group—to fill the gap between public housing for the low income group and private homes and luxury apartments for the higher income group.

Unfortunately, inflation has also affected the operation of the 213's. Heavy increases in carrying charges have occurred over the years, and these increases have forced many of the tenant-stockholders, most of whom are veterans, to vacate their apartments because of their inability to meet such increased charges. There have been practically no foreclosures of section 213 cooperatives and thus the fund created by the mortgage insurance premiums has not been touched. Section 213 cooperatives have proven to be excellent insurance risks in the past, and there is no reason to believe that this condition will not continue in the future. These people are entitled to every possible consideration, and a reduction in the mortgage insurance premiums would be a tremendous help to the tenant-stockholders.

I am reintroducing this bill in the House again today. Several years have elapsed since there has been anything done and it would be particularly bad to keep accumulating this money when it would give many people who need the help, the benefit of it.

I am very happy to see that the Committee on Banking and Currency has just announced that it would now be in favor of such a reduction in the FHA insurance premium, and agrees with my efforts to reduce the premium to one-fourth of 1 percent. The committee has stated that the FHA now has reserves more than ample to weather a real estate crisis even as serious as the great depression.

Such a position by the committee certainly would indicate that we can finally look forward to some favorable action by the Congress on this legislation which I have been advocating for the last 4 years.

I urge my colleagues to join with me in passing this legislation promptly so that we can correct a basic inequity and thus discharge our obligations and responsibilities to the people.

Item Veto

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS M. PELLY
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, January 9, 1959

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing a concurrent resolution to implement the recommendation of President Eisenhower in his state of the Union message on January 9, 1959, for giving the Chief Executive item veto power in connection with appropriation and authorization bills.

As the President said, the responsibility either to approve or to veto specific items is one of the most important corrections that could be made in our annual expenditure program because of the savings of tax dollars that would result.

My proposal, Mr. Speaker, is an amendment to the joint rules of the House and Senate not only providing veto power of individual items in appropriation bills but also veto power of authorizations for borrowing funds direct from the Federal Treasury. This is the only answer I see for eliminating nonessential spending and unnecessary projects.

I know that when this item veto power was requested by former Presidents, the argument was advanced by some Members of Congress that in the President's hands we would place the power to use pressure on or punish individual Members of Congress who did not vote the way a President wanted them to on his administration's measures.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, there have been times when Members have been subject to pressure, and we all have legislation which could be used against us. But our first responsibility is to the Nation and any vindictive veto would boomerang under the light of publicity; or it could be overridden by Congress. Certainly Members know in their hearts that the passage of this concurrent resolution is one necessary and important way of restoring fiscal responsibility and Federal economy to our Nation.

I hope the Judiciary Committee will consider this matter.

A Bill That Offers an Effective Way To Make This a Nation of Better Homes

OF
HON. RUSSELL V. MACK
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, January 9, 1959

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Speaker, on the opening day of Congress I introduced a bill—H.R. 196—which, if enacted, would grant to an American taxpayer an income tax deduction of up to $2,000 on money he spends during a calendar year to repair or modernize his owner-occupied home.

Under my bill the first 3 percent of income spent for such home repair and modernization cannot be claimed as a deduction. Everything expended on such work above this 3 percent, up to $2,000 in any one year, is deductible.

The citizen with a $5,000 gross income would obtain no deduction on the first $150 spent on such work. The person with a $10,000 gross income would obtain no deduction until after he had spent $300. The amount spent above the $150 or $300, as the case might be, would be deductible but not more than $2,000 by any one taxpayer in any one year.

This deduction is similar to that now allowed taxpayers on medical and hospital bills.

The obvious purpose of this proposed legislation is to speed up and increase home repairing and home modernization by homeowners. There are 6 million dwellings in the Nation that are rundown, dilapidated, and in desperate need of repair and modernization. The allowing homeowners tax credits for funds spent in improving their dwellings should encourage an enormous amount of home improvement and thereby make the Nation better housed.

How much would such a program of tax credits for home repair and modernization, as my bill proposes, cost in lost tax revenues. My reply is very little or perhaps nothing at all.

The tax credits granted, of course, will decrease the income taxes paid by the home owner. However, this loss in revenue quickly would be offset by creating many sources of additional income tax revenue.

First. The repair and modernization program this legislation would generate would provide tens of thouands of additional jobs for building tradesmen of all kinds—carpenters, plumbers, electricians, painters, brick masons and others—and these, because of their increased earnings, will pay more taxes.

Second. Businessmen and corporations which deal in building materials of all kinds at the manufacturing, wholesale or retail level, all, will enjoy larger sales and profits. They as a result of this program will pay more income taxes into the Treasury, in the case of corporations, as much as 52 percent of their increased profits.

Third. The increased employment a great home repair and modernization program will create will lessen the drain on unemployment reserves.

Fourth. Improved homes also mean increased real estate values and automatically more tax revenues at the local level for States, counties, cities, and schools.

Fifth. The increased sales and profits and the increased employment and wages generated by such a program for the building industry and its employees will raise the general level of prosperity for all businesses which also then will pay more taxes into the Treasury.

The increased revenues created by such a program from all five of these sources will in large part or entirely overcome any loss of income tax revenues the Government would experience from this tax exemption.

Most of all the program would provide millions of Americans within a very few years with better, more beautiful, and more healthy homes. This intangible benefit may be far greater and more lasting even than the financial one.

I urge that home building contractors, members of the building trades unions, and dealers in and producers of building materials of all kinds give careful study to my bill. If they believe the idea sound and desirable, I urge that they discuss this bill—H.R. 196—with their associates and through their associations and unions pass resolutions urging enactment of this bill—H.R. 196—by the present 86th Congress. I, as Congressman, will use such resolutions to promote support by Congressmen of my bill. Such resolutions, or letters, I assure you, will be most helpful in obtaining enactment of this bill, which if enacted I am sure will help add materially to the prosperity of the Nation as well as providing the American people with a vast number of better homes.

Proposal To Increase Postage Rates

OF
HON. JOHN LESINSKI
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, January 9, 1959

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I disagree most emphatically with President Eisenhower's proposal to increase first-class postal rates to a rumored 5 cents.

As a member of the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, I will not go along with another first-class postal rate increase; I think it is unfair to ask the average American, the small taxpayer and small businessman, who are already overburdened with taxes, to assume this additional tax load. This proposal of the President's is another clear indication of his complete subservience to the big business interests.

Take a look at the following statistics showing the differences between first-class mail, which is used by the average American when he writes a letter, and second-class mail, which is used by the big magazine publishers. The figures are for fiscal year 1958:

	First-class mail	Second-class mail
Pieces handled	32,218,319,000	7,147,956,000
Total weight	921,402,000	2,695,076,000
Total revenue	$1,092,441,000	$65,622,000

Total income from all classes of mail, $2,314,038,000.

Therefore, of the total income to the Post Office Department in fiscal year 1958—which, incidentally, was before the 4-cent rate went into effect—first-class mail was already producing over 47 percent, while the big business users of second-class mail contributed only a little over 2 percent. Add airmail revenue of $136,580,000 to first-class mail revenues and you will see that the everyday users of the 4-cent and 7-cent stamps are the ones who are carrying the burden of postal costs, while the postman who delivers your mail has to shoulder the burden of one-third of a pound on an average for each piece of second-class mail, but only one-thirty-second of a pound for each average piece of first-class mail.

I think that President Eisenhower would do well to devote his efforts toward closing the tax loopholes and special concessions to big business in order to get additional revenue for the Federal Government, instead of constantly trying to milk the small individual taxpayer and small businessman.

The Rehabilitation Act of 1959

OF
HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, January 9, 1959

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced H.R. 1119, entitled "The Rehabilitation Act of 1959." I wish to make a few comments about this bill and about the rehabilitation program in general.

As you know, I serve as chairman of the Labor-HEW Subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee. In this capacity, I have reviewed the appropriation requests of the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation and have become intimately acquainted with the operations of the State-Federal program of rehabilitation. I have great confidence in its leadership on both State and Federal levels and in the general integrity of the program. Each year shows a greater number of handicapped persons completing their rehabilitation, 74,000 in 1958, and the quality of services is also improving, particularly for the severely handicapped.

At the same time, however, I have been conscious of the weaknesses in this program and have, from time to time, spoken out on this subject. My chief concern has been that some of the most severely handicapped persons are being denied services because such services do not appear to be feasible for them under the definition of rehabilitation found in present legislation. The present act, Mr. Speaker, is a vocational rehabilitation act. For a handicapped person to be served under this act there must be a reasonable expectation that he will be employable following services. There are many severely handicapped persons in this country who could profit substantially from rehabilitation services but who must be denied such services because of his restricted definition. This also means that many borderline cases may be rejected, because the chances of failure may be greater than the chances of success. The bill I have just introduced has been designed to correct some of the weaknesses which have been described above.

EVALUATION SERVICES

An adequate evaluation service is essential for all rehabilitation applicants, but particularly so for the most severely disabled. This evaluation is medical, psychological, social, and vocational. It takes time and is expensive, but it is essential if there is to be an adequate understanding of the rehabilitation potential of the individual. At the present time, there is no one place in most of our communities, or no one agency, which has the responsibility for providing an adequate diagnostic service for all handicapped adults. My bill would provide Federal assistance to the States to enable State rehabilitation agencies to establish such comprehensive evaluation services.

INDEPENDENT LIVING

One title of this bill sets up a program of independent living rehabilitation for severely handicapped people for whom there may not be a reasonable expectation of employability at the time they make application, but who can achieve a degree of independence which will enable them to dispense with the need for expensive institutional care or an attendant at home. This will mean that rehabilitation agencies may begin services for people who may not appear to be employable following services. Actually, experience has shown that many such individuals do achieve vocational rehabilitation.

REHABILITATION FACILITIES

At the present time, there is a program of rehabilitation facilities under the Hospital Survey and Construction Act, commonly called the Hill-Burton Act. This program has been useful in establishing, in the main, medical rehabilitation facilities. Under this act it is not possible to assist in the establishment of rehabilitation workshops or many other rehabilitation facilities. As a result, there are many badly needed rehabilitation facilities for which there is no Federal assistance at this time. My bill sets up in the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare a program of rehabilitation facilities which would be used to establish workshops for the mentally ill, mentally retarded, cerebral palsied, and many other severely handicapped individuals; speech and hearing centers; rehabilitation centers for the blind, and many other types. Provisions are made for the coordination of this program with the Hill-Burton program, so as to prevent any possibility of duplication.

PRESIDENT'S COMMITTEE

One of the provisions of my bill would increase the appropriation authority for the President's Committee on the Employment of the Handicapped from $225,000 to $300,000. The President's Committee is an organization of private individuals and voluntary organizations dedicated to increasing employment opportunities for physically handicapped individuals. The Federal Government makes an appropriation annually to support a small staff which guides this voluntary activity. In my judgment, the committee is doing an excellent job in creating a climate favorable to the employment of the handicapped. The small increase in appropriation authority will take care of necessary increases in costs and provide for a modest expansion of services during the next 3 or 4 years.

Mr. Speaker, in this bill I have tried to fill the most significant gaps in present rehabilitation legislation. The bill provides for Federal assistance for a centralized, comprehensive evaluation system for all handicapped adults. It extends rehabilitation services to individuals for whom there cannot be at the beginning, a reasonable expectation of employability. It provides for a supplementary program of rehabilitation facilities under which will be built the many facilities which are needed to rehabilitate the handicapped. Finally, it increases the appropriation authority for the President's Committee on the Employment of the Handicapped. I sincerely hope that the House Committee on Education and Labor will conduct hearings on this legislation at an early date. The passage of this legislation will do much to increase rehabilitation opportunities for our most severely disabled citizens.

Annual Convention Banquet of Veterans of World War I, Springfield, Ill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 9, 1959

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to include herein my remarks made to the annual convention banquet of the Veterans of World War I, which was held at the Hotel Leland in Springfield, Ill., on Tuesday, September 16, 1958, as follows:

It is a happy choice that our first national convention, under a Federal charter, is taking place in Springfield, Ill.

As a native of Massachusetts, I am proud of the fact that many of the early settlers who built their own homes on this new land near the "River of Men," came from such places as Salem and Springfield in Massachusetts.

On this, my first visit to the capital city of Illinois, I am aware of this historical process at work. Those of us who traveled here from New England, are impressed by the beauty and charm of Springfield, but, even more, we sense the invisible presence of the man whose immortal spirit brought unity to our Nation.

It was many, many years ago that Abraham Lincoln rose to greatness, during a critical period in our history. It was almost midway between the Revolutionary War and the cold war of 1958.

And then, before his work was done, he came home to his last resting place in the Midwest. His remains are embraced by the good earth of Oak Grove Cemetery, the national shrine at Springfield, Ill.

He understood the agony that divided our Nation through 4 years of civil strife. Each furrow in his brow, each deepening line on that tragic face, bore witness to the pain and sacrifice that he suffered to bring freedom through that first and most awesome test of its young manhood.

Lincoln had compassion for the men in blue and the men in gray.

If death had not stilled his generous heart, just as it closed the life of another President in our own day, and in each case just before the final victory, I am sure that he would have made plans to provide for the Civil War veterans during the sunset years of their earthly journey.

It was in the final paragraph of his second inaugural address that Lincoln said: "Let us strive * * * to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow, and his orphan."

A little known fact to Americans of today, is the time and study and lengthy debate given to the question of providing compensation and pensions for war veterans from the 1st Congress up to the 85th which adjourned in August of the present year.

As far as we who gather at this convention are concerned, that debate goes on.

In the 86th Congress, which convenes in January of 1959, we shall work toward our objective, which is the enactment of a $100 pension per month for all honorably discharged veterans of World War I who are over 62 years of age.

And providing that the pension to which a person is entitled under this proposed legislation shall be in addition to any compensation to which such person may be entitled for service-connected disability.

As change is the law of life, the policies of the Federal Government toward the veterans who have served it so well in the various wars, have been shaped by many experiments and many experiences.

From disability compensation to a pure pension is a rough and twisting road where many Congresses have lost their way as they tried to find the right program for the aging veterans.

Public attitudes toward veterans as a whole, have gone through quite a transformation since the end of the Revolutionary War.

The first national pension law was passed by the Continental Congress on August 26, 1776. Every officer, soldier, or sailor losing a limb in any engagement or being so disabled in the service of the United States as to render him incapable of earning his livelihood, was promised half pay for life, or during disability.

The Revolutionary Service Pension Law of 1818, introduced a new principle into this field of legislation. Before this time, disability was the firm requirement for the payment of any pension. With the new law, mere service in the Armed Forces, together with poverty, became the basis for entitlement.

Congress adopted a pure service pension schedule for the Revolutionary War survivors, on June 7, 1832. This Act granted full pay for life to veterans who had served a minimum of 2 years.

The Mexican War Pension Act of 1887, granted a pension, if the veteran was suffering from disabilities to a pensionable degree. Veterans 62 years of age or older were entitled to a pension, regardless of any disability.

The trend was plain to see. Congress was becoming more liberal with the experience of each successive war.

In the debate on the Mexican War Pension Act Senator Hoar, af Massachusetts, pleaded for uniformity, for consistency of action on the part of Congress. He explained that if the Government were bound, as a matter of principle, to pension soldiers or sailors who do not need the pension, and who are under no disability, then it is a universal principle, and as such, the veterans of all wars are entitled to the pension. Enactment of the bill, said the Senator, would very shortly compel the Congress to take the next step—a pure service pension for the Civil War veterans.

The Mexican War Pension Act was debated for 3 years.

But the arguments in favor of it finally overwhelmed the opposition, and Congress passed the bill in January 1887.

The Dependent Pension Act of 1890 was a service-pension law. Pensioners, however, were required to demonstrate their inability to perform manual labor as a means of supporting themselves.

This law spawned many abuses, and gave rise to much dissatisfaction.

Widespread agitation led to the act of May 11, 1912, setting up a formula whereby the Civil War veteran must have served at least 90 days in that conflict, and that he must be 62 years of age or older. The amounts provided for on a graduated scale according to length of service, have been increased from time to time since 1912.

The act of June 5, 1920, was entitled "An act to pension soldiers and sailors of the war with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition."

It provided that any such person who has reached the age of 62 years, shall, upon making proof of such fact, be placed upon the pension roll.

As for pure service pensions, the Spanish American War still remains our most recent conflict for which pensions have been authorized by the Congress.

Obviously, the veterans of World War I are next in order.

When Congress passed a bill to provide adjusted compensation for the veterans of 1917–18 it was vetoed by President Harding on September 19, 1922. In the message explaining his action, the President was looking to the future when he said that it is inevitable as the years pass that pension provision for World War veterans will be made, as it has been made for those who served in previous wars.

That prophecy was made 36 years ago.

When we average out the length of time that the veterans of the five wars in American history, up to and including the Spanish-American War, had to wait before service pensions were authorized, we find that it takes nearly 43 years.

We, of World War I with 40 years behind us are close to the time of our entitlement.

When we consider that our good friends, the Spanish-American War veterans, only had to wait 22 years for their pensions, it would appear that favorable action on our claim cannot be delayed much longer.

In the last session of the Congress, when my bill to provide a Federal charter for our organization was being debated, there were a few who opposed the bill. They insisted that our group was organized for the sole purpose of "lobbying through Congress a general penssion bill that would provide $100 monthly to all World War I veterans regardless of need or length of service."

We have never concealed the fact that this is one of our objectives.

There is nothing sudden or revolutionary in such a proposal 40 years after World War I and following a precedent that was established long ago.

We believe that the veteran who is 62 years of age or older is entitled to a pension of $100 per month upon proof of age and honorable service.

We are certain that this is the simplest and fairest method by which the Nation's obligation to the aging veterans of World War I will be honored.

In the school of practical experience we have learned that few people in positions of leadership and influence showed any interest in pensions for the veterans of World War I, until our organization was founded. Its astounding growth within the past few years has opened the eyes of our legislators, and is reminding a grateful but sometimes absent-minded Nation that the pension issue is approaching decision day.

As we have found unity, and strength, and inspiring comradeship through our membership in the Veterans of World War I of the U.S.A., Inc., we have come to realize that only by such mobilization of our forces, directed toward the goal of a pension for all veterans of that conflict, can we win to our side, the public support that is necessary to achieve victory in this campaign.

But this is not the single and exclusive purpose of our organization.

If that were so, our reason for being, and our rediscovered community of interest would melt away as soon as the pension battle is won.

We have other objectives, as well.

For the veterans of World War I of the U.S.A. have a mission to uphold the Constitution of the United States, and the individual States of the Union, and to foster the spirit and practice of true Americanism.

We must fight unceasingly for our national security in order to protect Americans from enemies within our borders, as well as those from without, to the end that our American way of life be preserved.

We are the senior veterans of our country, inheriting the responsibilities of those who preceded us.

As guardians of the home front we must be alert and positive concerning the needs of our country today in its struggle with a foe who employs unseen weapons to confuse us, and hypnotize us, weapons that are difficult to counteract if they should dull the minds and the will of the United States and its people.

The veterans of World War I fought on the field of battle, where we came to grips with the enemy, and finally defeated him after much pain and sacrifice.

Since the end of World War I, new aggressors have come to power, threatening the peace of the world. They are much more cunning in their methods. And much more dangerous.

First there was fascism, and now communism.

The evil that was hatched in Moscow and that spread over a number of independent nations before the free world took steps to contain it, wages war constantly, even while it is shaking your hand.

In the First World War, aggressors depended almost entirely upon military power.

Espionage was in its infancy, largely limited to a few individual agents.

Psychology was a new word that only professors understood.

The man who was able to support a telephone in his home and an automobile in the one-stall garage that was located in the backyard was looked up to as a person of distinction.

The airplane was a fragile, one-man flying machine of doubtful speed and range.

As for radio and television, they were just dreams.

In the past 40 years, as these techniques and inventions became commonplace facts, the free nations developed them for peacetime use, and as aids to a more abundant life for their people.

The dictatorships, however, applied this knowledge to serve the aggressive purposes of the all-powerful state.

Communism, because of its long experience in conspiracy, saw the possibilities of using this new knowledge to extend its control over the minds and lives of mankind.

And so the Communists developed the cunning weapons of indirect aggression; infiltration, subversion, propaganda, and brainwashing.

While fomenting trouble in Korea and Indochina, and diverting some of our strength and attention to those areas, they were making their plans to provoke unrest elsewhere.

They are aiding and abetting Nasser in his ambition to become lord and master of the Arab world and to become a tool of the Communists, although he does not seem to realize this danger as yet. You may be sure, at this very moment, while our attention is focused on the problems of one area, the Communists are sowing the seeds of confusion and turmoil in some other area. All for the purpose of bewildering the free world, causing it to react impulsively with too little and too late, keeping us always on the defensive with jabs that are intended to wear us down.

The Communists know how deep is the yearning for peace, and so they start a so-called peace offensive, calculating that many sincere people will be taken in by the mere repetition of the word "peace." In the process, the Communists make headway on their real, though hidden, purpose. They seek in this manner, to weaken the will of the free nations, to beguile them into a reduction of expenditures for defense by appealing to individual selfishness, and to spread the fatal belief that it is somehow possible to coexist with them. Even though the record proves that this tyranny will betray anything and everything to reach its goal of world conquest.

They know that people forget.

Less than 2 years ago, they sent their armed forces into Hungary to crush the brave people who had overthrown the Red government that had been imposed upon them. Only a few months ago, they announced the execution of those who led the freedom fighters, whom they had seized in violation of a safe-conduct pledge.

This summer, they self-righteously protested the arrival of American troops in Lebanon, and British troops in Jordan, in spite of the fact that these military units were invited by the duly constituted governments of those small nations, to protect them from indirect aggression.

On the face of it, the Russian demands for the immediate withdrawal of the allied forces was a flagrant example of Red hypocrisy.

How could they protest our peaceful and temporary intervention, in the light of their bloody invasion of Hungary that wiped out its newly won independence and while their troops still occupy that unhappy land in defiance of the United Nations?

Their brazen contempt for reason, and justice, and world opinion is based on their assurance that people forget.

Unfortunately many do forget.

The Communists know that if they press their initiative and keep repeating such attractive words as "peoples' republic," "democracy," and "peace" over and over again, the ignorant and the innocent alike will be deceived by slogans into believing that: "Well, maybe we can do business with them after all."

That is exactly the response that the Communists want.

The intended victims do not realize that anyone who trusts the Communists and let's down his guard is halfway into the trap with its bait to lure the unwary and its barbed wire that prevents their escape.

Never forget that it took only a handful of Bolshevik conspirators, who knew what they wanted, to secure control of Russia, when the long-suffering Russian people, further drained by military defeats, forced the abdication of Czar Nicholas.

The majority of Russians with moderate views could not get together on an effective program.

While they argued among themselves as to what they should do, the ruthless minority of Bolsheviks confused and tricked the debaters, while the Red strong-arm squads took over the war ministry, the police stations, and the communication centers.

That was in 1917.

Since then, they have built up a system of tight control over the Russian people. Mixing propaganda and terror, they have channeled and driven the energies of the Russian people in a tremendous effort to build up heavy industry, and military power.

Not content with that, they have reached out and have absorbed into their empire, a number of neighboring nations.

Operating from Moscow, communism has agents and dupes trying to subvert many other nations around the globe.

With fanatical zeal, communism has developed from a small band of conspirators in 1917, until now it is a present danger to every free nation in the world.

Back in that same year, 1917, the United States became a world power.

Since the beginning of our nation we had lived a protected existence, with two wide oceans that separated us from the problems in the rest of the world, while we concentrated on our internal growth and progress.

It was the maturing power and idealism of the United States that won victory for the Allies in World War I.

From that point on, even though we did not realize it, the burden and the responsibility of leading the free world was on our shoulders because there was no other nation with the faith backed by the material resources, to do the job.

Many of our people, including some in high places, closed their eyes to this fact.

The pacifism of the twenties, the neutrality of the thirties—these were the symptoms of our retreat from international realities.

That is why we were unprepared, both in our thinking and in our ability to defend ourselves on December 7, 1941.

Then we had time to recover from the blow.

Now, we have none, because intercontinental missiles with hydrogen warheads will soon be able to leap across the oceans that had isolated us from direct attack in the past.

There is no turning back to the uncomplicated days of our Nation's adolescence.

Communist Russia is determined to forge ahead in every field, and there is disturbing evidence that the Reds have gained the lead in two critical areas: in the number of engineers, technicians, and scientists that they graduate each year; and in their development of the powerful rockets that will be the key to military supremacy, and to the control of outer space.

If our national reaction to this is a business-as-usual attitude, instead of vigilance, look-ahead policies, and extra effort, we shall find ourselves on the road to inevitable defeat.

We have some responsible leaders of government who are aware of this danger. There are competent officers in the Pentagon; and the scientists who are working on our rocket and space exploration programs are among the world's best.

All this, however, is not enough.

I am thinking of Abraham Lincoln, who would walk miles to get a book and study it by the uncertain light of the fireplace in his log cabin, to prepare himself for the time when the Nation needed him.

I am thinking of the American initiative that opened up the West; that ventured into the unseen and the unknown because it was not afraid to advance beyond comfort and security in order to dare and do.

In this wonderful land of ours, with all the blessings we enjoy, there are too many people in 1958 who want to play it safe and to avoid the hard thinking and the resolute actions without which there is no leadership.

The vision, courage, and effort of the people, as it was in Lincoln's time, is required to animate our Nation.

How can our Federal Government make up its mind and go forward toward the solution of international problems, and to discover the new worlds of outer space in freedom's name, unless it hears from us?

As the Declaration of Independence states: "Governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

This does not simply mean the form and organization of government; the laws which define and limit its authority; and the routine services it performs for us.

Far more important is the confident mandate that it must receive from the people to embark on those programs that are imperative if freedom is not to mark time, and fall behind the dynamic drive of communism.

That clear call for constructive action, welling up from the people of the United States sounds but faintly in Washington today.

It must speak up and it must be heard.

Demanding that we strengthen our allies and strengthen the United Nations, but, let's face it, in the uncertain world of today, the fate of freedom depends on the leadership, or lack of leadership, of the United States and its people.

On January 23 the Preparedness Subcommittee of the U.S. Senate issued a unanimous report stating that the Soviet Union is ahead of us in missiles and in submarines. Experts testified that our competitors are producing scientists and technicians at a rate substantially greater than our own.

On August 28, American educators pointed out that Russian is putting 10 to 15 percent of its total income into educational channels, while Americans are spending only 3 to 5 percent on education.

Unless we get going, the Reds will not only catch up with us; they will overpower us.

If such should come to pass, it will do no good to think that we are far ahead of the Russians in the number of automobiles, ranchhouses, bank accounts, and insurance policies. These, together with our schools and universities, our churches and our free press, our labor unions, and our industries, would be seized, controlled, and used by the dictatorship that is communism. Such voluntary groups as the World War I Veterans of the United States of America would not be tolerated.

Our organization has the rare opportunity, because it is new, to dedicate itself to the task of rousing our Nation from its complacency.

I take the liberty of suggesting that our organization, by the united effort of our barracks that network the Nation shall organize and energize a drive to alert America.

We must have the most modern defense system; one that is constantly improving its efficiency under the realistic leadership of such men as the late Gen. Billy Mitchell, General Gavin, who recently resigned from the Army that he loved, so that he could tell the truth to the American people and Admiral Rickover, who overcame many service obstacles to develop a nuclear-powered submarine fleet.

To achieve this, and the economic system to sustain it, we must give top priority to education. For everything depends on applied knowledge; putting freedom to work, and putting science to work. We need to give more of our resources, more of our encouragement, and more of our honors to education. The old idea that education is completed by the award of a high school diploma, or a college degree, is one of the most dangerous of illusions. To keep ahead of the Russians it will be necessary for Americans, grownups as well as youngsters, to keep on learning, under an expanded educational system that will discover new ways and methods to bring forth the best in all.

Our Nation must also do a better job in reaching the peoples of this world with the truth concerning our principles and our policies. Within the United States, we have succeeded in developing the art of communication to a degree that is mutually beneficial to our people, to the economy, and to the free exchange of ideas. For some strange reason, we have not been able to communicate as effectively with our neighbors in other countries.

There is a powerful ferment at work throughout this world, as desperately poor and backward people are waking up and are reaching for the better life that should and can be theirs.

So far it is a peaceful revolution that the United States, above all nations should understand and assist.

If we fail them in their hour of need, they will have no other choice but to follow the siren call of communism.

Our Nation cannot rest upon its past.

It cannot close its eyes to new horizons if it is to be true to itself and to the submerged peoples who look to the United States for leadership.

We have the means but lack the firm and steady purpose.

This is the very heart of the problem.

We need the spirit of Paul Revere and the response of the Minutemen at Concord and Lexington. We need the humanity and courage of Abraham Lincoln. We need to measure up to the searchers in the wagon trains, the dauntless homesteaders who crossed the Mississippi to open up the unknown West.

Reviving, bringing to life within ourselves, the ability to make forward decisions.

For the rest of the world will not wait.

We have the last chance to create the most productive educational system in the world.

We have a short time left to find the serious purpose, and to start the bold actions that will lead the hunger of mankind toward the discovery of freedom and progress.

I sound the warning not to panic, but to wake up.

And I say to you, my comrades of World War I, that this is our opportunity and responsibility.

For here, in this hall, we feel close to the Great Emancipator.

With the wisdom of eternity, He is calling upon us to give the greatest service to humanity at a fateful hour in the life of man.

Out of this wealth of mind and soul, rising up from our membership, we must develop the program and the dedicated purpose that will inspire America to pioneer again.

Latin Americans Not Only Our Good Neighbors but Our Best Friends

OF

HON. VICTOR L. ANFUSO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 9, 1959

Mr. ANFUSO. Mr. Speaker, during part of November and December 1958, I visited several South American countries, notably Argentina, Brazil, Uruquay, and some of the West Indies islands, in connection with my resolution to establish a Pan American Parliamentary Association—PAPA—to help unite the Western Hemisphere for its own well-being and security. On previous occasions I had visited other Latin American countries, that is, Mexico, Panama, Venezuela, and Cuba. In these countries I met with top government officials and parliamentary leaders with whom I discussed the aims and purposes of my resolution, and I also had the opportunity to familiarize myself with conditions there and with some of their pressing problems.

I came away with a feeling stronger than ever that the idea proposed in my resolution is not only most timely, but that its realization is most urgent. I am now revising and expanding the resolution on the basis of my findings during these Latin American trips, and I plan to introduce the revised version in the very near future.

You may recall, Mr. Speaker, that the original resolution which I had offered before the closing days of the 85th Congress had been approved in principle by 12 of the 20 Latin American countries, with not a single objection. Furthermore, I was encouraged by our State Department to visit South America and discuss the proposal further with legislators of those countries. I am now pleased to report to you and to all my colleagues of the House that my resolution and its central purpose was very well received in the countries I visited.

The chairman of the foreign affairs committee of Argentina's Chamber of Deputies, Juan Lopez, was extremely enthusiastic about my plan, as was also President Ranieri Mazzilli of the Brazilian Chamber of Deputies. Mr. Lopez made a public statement in which he said about the proposed Pan American Parliamentary Association:

> It could mean a new stage in the relations among our countries, a new era of good friendship.

Remembering how strained relations had been between Argentina and the United States during the Peron regime and Argentina's recent $100 million loan deal with the Soviet Union, the words of Deputy Lopez were welcome indeed.

The major fault which the Latin Americans have found with us is that we have not dealt with them as equals. You must remember that Latin Americans are a very proud people. They do not want any charity from us, but neither do they desire to be looked down upon. Argentina is a striking example of this national pride. Although Peron milked the country dry, so to speak, and completely emptied its treasury before he fled, Argentina today will not accept anything from the United States or from any other country unless it be on a straight business basis.

We have been hearing a great deal in the past year regarding Communist inroads into the Latin American countries. I have found that the people of those countries do not want communism; in fact, they are very much opposed to it. Christianity is too strongly embedded all through Latin America. Those countries will take Communist help only as a last resort—that is, if we should turn our backs on them and refuse to recognize their legitimate aspirations and their desires for equality and mutual respect from their brother-Americans of the North.

There is a feeling among many of the Latin American leaders that in certain instances the United States had taken unilateral action in matters where they should have been consulted. They feel that our policy decisions have been formulated in such a way that only U.S. interests and the security of the United States alone appears to be the primary objectives, rather than the interests and the security of the whole Western Hemisphere. In seeking to promote our own self-interests, they say, we have given little or no regard to the government heads nor to the form of government of the Latin American countries. If it suited our purpose, we promoted or allowed to prosper oppressive dictators.

In such cases where we have been guilty of these practices we must revise our thinking and refuse to deal with, or give aid and comfort to, dictators who suppress human rights. This latter course would be more expressive of the true feelings of the people of the United States. It would also prevent the exploitation of our Latin American neighbors by the Communists. A policy which places the aspirations of all peoples of Latin America on a par with our own achieved goals of freedom and equal opportunity for all human beings, regardless of race, color, or creed, would be as successful in Latin America as it must be in any part of the world.

There is no doubt in my mind, based on discussions with leaders of the countries I visited, that they are strongly in favor of multilateral inter-American action against any possible foreign aggression. Furthermore, it is my sincere conviction that our neighbors to the South will enter into any agreement with us to help stem the tide of communism in the world and to join with us in any action aimed to enforce such agreement, provided it is arrived at by the joint and fair contributions of each of the participating nations of the hemisphere.

It is for these very reasons—equal treatment, fostering of human rights and joint participation—that my proposal to establish a Pan American Parliamentary Association has been not only welcomed but actually hailed by Latin Americans and called by them "the key to improved relations of the future." In PAPA each legislator will have an equal voice in the organization, whether he be a representative from the United States or from Uruguay, the smallest country in South America. This free exchange among the legislators of the Americas on all matters affecting their security, their cultural development and their economic well-being is the kind of recognition and mutual respect which they have always sought, but seldom obtained, from the United States.

In summarizing my views, I want to stress the following:

For the past few decades we have come to regard the Latin Americans as our good neighbors. But they are more than that. They are also our best friends. In Latin America today the United States has a golden opportunity of regaining much of the ground we have lost in other parts of the world, because of our failure to give due recognition to the aspirations of independent nations and by not hitting hard enough against colonialism.

The United States has a glorious chance to enhance its prestige and moral position in the eyes of all Latin Americans in becoming the champion of human rights, democratic principles, and true independence for all nations. But this must not be merely lipservice. We must cooperate with them as brother-Americans and as friendly neighbors to assist them in their hour of need.

May I also offer the suggestion that in our dealings with Latin America we take advantage of the help which our very strong and devoted ally Italy can render in this direction. Latin American countries are heavily populated by people of Italian origin. The strongest influence in Brazil, Argentina and Uruguay is Italian in nature. Italians occupy very important offices in these countries and are leaders in industry, business, commerce, and other phases of national life. São Paulo, Brazil, a city of 3,500,000 people—probably the fourth largest in the whole Western Hemisphere—is more than one-third Italian. This is also true in similar measure of Buenos Aires, the capital of Argentina, and Montevideo, the capital of Uruguay. The Speaker of the Chamber of Deputies of Brazil, Mazzilli, and the President of Argentina, Frondizi, are born of Italian immigrant parents.

It would seem most logical to utilize this friendly influence in the interests of democracy, and most especially in helping to cement the most cordial relationship among the nations of the Americas in a spirit of real neighborly cooperation. I might add that we should also extend the practice of utilizing our allies in other parts of the world where they are more familiar and in a better position to deal with certain problems in such areas affecting the United States and our allies, as well.

I now wish to cite some specific examples concerning Brazil, Uruguay, and Argentina—in the order that I visited them—where assistance would be appreciated, how such assistance could be most helpful, and how it would serve to achieve genuine friendship and inter-American cooperation.

BRAZIL

This is the largest country in all of Latin America, almost the size of the U.S., with a population of approximately 62 million.

Brazil has rich natural resources, which, if properly explored and utilized, could make her one of the wealthiest nations in the world. Its president, Juscelino Kubitschek, recognizes this fact and is exerting all his efforts to encourage his people to move out from the eastern areas and settle the Brazilian west, that part of the country which is today almost totally uninhabited. It is a fact that 93 percent of the Brazilian population inhabits only 36 percent of the country's territory, with their backs to the deserted hinterland. This is the area where the soil is richer than that presently explored and settled. Gold, crystals, diamonds and gems are hidden there. Throughout Brazil are also to be found rich deposits of iron ore, manganese, nickel and zinc.

In order to encourage Brazilians to leave the congested environs of Rio de Janeiro and São Paulo, Kubitschek is moving the national capital, which will be called Brasilia, from Rio de Janeiro to the interior in the hinterland. He is confronted by inadequate transportation and power, as well as many other obstacles, but present indications are that he will succeed in this effort if he obtains the necessary financing and technological assistance.

Here, then, is a country which hates communism so much so that up until this day Brazil has refused to have diplomatic relations with Soviet Russia. How long this situation will last depends largely upon our actions. Without any financial sacrifice on our part, we can help this country become self-sufficient and economically independent through reasonable loans from the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, as well as by the proper exercise of our own Public Law 480, known as the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954.

In 1958 Brazil had a 50 percent shortage in her production of wheat. At the same time, we have wheat bulging from our warehouses and rotting away. We could easily enlarge our Public Law 480 program for Brazil to make available to her some of our surplus wheat, corn, tobacco, cotton, and other commodities which we have in surplus. A large part of Public Law 480 funds could be used by Brazil to improve her transportation, power and communications systems. Thus, her settlement of the western areas and her goal for self-sufficiency would be realized.

URUGUAY

Here is the smallest country on the South American continent with a population of only 2,200,000. Of significance to us, however, is the fact that Uruguay has recognized Soviet Russia, is doing business with the Communists and allows them to mainatin an Embassy there which is the largest in South America, much larger than our own. The Soviet Union maintains a personnel force in Uruguay of 72 people—all spies. Obviously, their interest in not merely Uruguay. Russia uses Uruguay as a base through which she hopes to penetrate Brazil, Argentina and other Latin American countries. In this respect, she is aided and abetted by the embassies of the other Iron Curtain countries in Uruguay. It is common knowledge that the Communists have complete control over the waterfront in Montevideo and that they can tie up transportation at any time.

It may be asked: Do the people of Uruguay want communism? It is significant that in the recent elections held there the Communists polled less votes than they did in previous elections. At the present time there are only 2 Communist deputies out of a total of 99 in the Chamber of Deputies. But the control of the waterfront by the Communists and their strength in labor circles, in addition to their use of Uruguay as a port of entry for the penetration and infiltration of all of South America, presents a very serious threat which we must recognize and with which we must deal immediately.

Here again it takes only sympathetic understanding of the problems facing Uruguay and simple honest dealing to check the Communists and to nullify their influence. Let me give you several examples where we have failed in our relations with this tiny country and where the Communists utilized these incidents to their advantage:

I. In 1949, under GATT—the General Agreement for Trade and Tariffs—the United States concluded an agreement with Uruguay for certain reciprocal reductions in import duties. The U.S. Government postponed action in proclaiming these duty reductions because Uruguay was not yet formally a member of GATT. When Uruguay's membership in GATT was ratified in 1953, the Uruguayan Government also ratified the duty reductions promised by Uruguay. By that time, however, it was more difficult for the United States to put certain of its promised duty reductions on canned and preserved meats into force because U.S. producers of meat were not prospering as much as they had been in 1949. The United States, therefore, put into effect the other duty reductions it had agreed upon but did not proclaim the following duty reductions which were the ones most desired by Uruguay:

First. A reduction from 20 to 15 percent in the minimum ad valorem duty on corned beef.

Second. A reduction from 7½ cents per pound to 3¾ cents per pound duty on meat extract.

Third. A reduction from 20 to 10 percent in the minimum ad valorem duty on pickled or cured beef and veal.

The delay in proclaiming these duty reductions agreed upon in 1949 has now been the longest delay in any such pending action by the U.S. Government.

II. In 1953 the U.S. Treasury Department applied an 18 percent additional duty against Uruguayan wool tops—the longer, higher grade wool which has been combed out of the raw wool, leaving behind the short fibers or noils. The reason for this additional duty, which was called a countervailing duty, was that the combers of wool in the United States had protested that the Uruguayan Government was giving assistance to the exporters of Uruguayan wool tops by granting them a rate of exchange for their product that resulted in their receiving more pesos per dollar than the exporters of most other Uruguayan products. A calculation of this exchange benefit showed that the rate for export of wool tops provided, in fact, 18 percent more pesos than the weighted average of exchange rates on all other Uruguayan exports and imports. This is the only countervailing duty applied by the United States because of a subsidy granted by a foreign government through special incentive exchange rates.

A few years ago, the countervailing duty was decreased to 6 percent because the Uruguayan exchange rate incentive was calculated to have decreased to that amount. We now expect that it may soon be demonstrable—when certain new exchange rates are announced—that the incentive has been eliminated as compared with the average rate on all other Uruguayan exports and imports. The Treasury Department has indicated that, when that can be demonstrated, the countervailing duty will be abolished. It is the opinion of our Embassy officials in Montevideo that this measure, which the Uruguayan Government and public have considered to be discriminatory, has been prejudicial to U.S. relations with Uruguay to such an extent that serious question may logically be raised as to whether the maximum U.S. interest has been served by applying this isolated measure against Uruguayan wool tops.

III. For several years there has been in effect in the United States a tariff quota governing the importation of various classifications of textiles into the United States. The tariff quota for woolen textiles provides that a certain total quantity of these materials may be imported from all sources of supply at a 25-percent ad valorem rate of duty; when that quota is filled, which is usually in June of the calendar year, the rate of duty goes up to 40-percent ad valorem. Very good quality woolen suiting materials are manufactured in Uruguay, and since this product is made entirely out of Uruguayan raw material, it would seem to offer more hope than any Uruguayan manufactured product of finding an increasingly large market abroad with resulting obvious advantages to the Uruguayan economy. Uruguayan exporters, however, complain that they have difficulty in marketing their woolen suiting materials in the United States because their buyers can never be quite certain of the exact cost throughout the year in comparison with domestic sources of supply.

President Eisenhower requested, a year or so ago, that an interdepartmental committee be formed to determine upon a more workable system for governing the duty of this type of imports because of complaints about the tariff-quota system. It would be very beneficial for the Uruguayan economy if the tariff system could be arranged in some way that would provide some modest preference for this unique Western Hemisphere source of supply of woolen suiting materials. In fact, it would not seem unreasonable to exempt Western Hemisphere sources entirely from the higher ad valorem rate of duty on woolen textiles. Uruguay would be the only country that would profit from this and the quantity of material that could be imported from Uruguay, even with a very large increase, would probably not noticeably disturb the market for domestic manufactures of competitive materials in the United States.

Fourth. The largest Uruguayan export is wool, usually about 55 percent of total exports. The largest buyer of this wool is now the Soviet Union. In return, the Soviet Union offers crude petroleum at a bargain price—about 50 cents less per barrel than the same petroleum would cost in the regular world market. The Soviet Union has also recently sold a cargo of cotton to Uruguay—presumably cotton which Russia obtained from Egypt. The Uruguayans do not like to depend upon the Soviet Union as a market for their products, or even as a source of supply for essential imports, such as petroleum, because, first, they know that the market or the source of supply can be closed off arbitrarily at any time; second, they know that they are likely to be asked for cooperation of other kinds as a quid pro quo for continuation of this trade; and third, they do not wish to encourage the kind of relationships that naturally follow trading relationships. However, with the Soviet Union now purchasing about 20 percent of their total wool exports, and with other purchasers buying slowly at present prices and with greater demand for quality, the Uruguayans feel that they are trapped by the necessity of trading with the Soviet Union.

It has been suggested by Uruguayans that the U.S. Government might solve this problem by purchasing wool for stockpiling. Since there is no provision for such stockpiling, another possibility might be a reduction in the U.S. duty on raw wool. However, the extensive repercussions from such a measure would be obvious, and it would not seem logical to consider such a difficult solution until it has been demonstrated that the much simpler problems outlined in the preceding paragraphs can be solved.

ARGENTINA

Argentina is about half the size of the United States and has a population of approximately 20 million. It is more of a melting pot than any other Latin American republic and its population is based on European immigration rather than on indigenous people. In contrast to most Latin American countries, 96 percent of Argentina's population is Caucasian. The country is predominantly Catholic and the literacy rate is about 85 percent—the highest in Latin America.

Argentina inherited serious economic problems from the Peron regime. Dictator Peron left an empty treasury which has stagnated economic growth and real per capita income, decapitalized industrial plants, deteriorated transportation networks, and has caused a serious domestic inflation of its currency. Argentina is not to be sold short, however. It still has one of the highest per capita gross national products in Latin America, the best average level of living in the area, and the largest middle class. Agriculture is still the chief source of wealth and provides about 90 to 95 percent of the country's export earnings. Chief products are meat, grains, vegetable oils and wool.

Argentina's basic problem, at present, is one of reconstruction and rehabilitation. Perhaps the basic requirement in this situation is the securing of capital to finance here needed rehabilitation and development program. I discussed this matter with our very able Ambassador to Argentina, the Honorable Willard L. Beaulac, and I gathered from such talks that our State Department was au courant with the situation in Argentina and sympathetic to the problems of the new administration of President Frondizi. I was happy to learn, immediately after my return to the United States, that Argentina is to receive a $329,000,000 loan from the U.S. Government, from the International Monetary Fund, and from 11 private banks in the United States and Canada in order to carry out sweeping economic reforms and its development program. In my opinion this is a great forward step.

President Arturo Frondizi, whom I had the pleasure of meeting at his residence, although he was supported by the Peronists in the general elections of February 23, 1958, shows no inclination of following Peron or encouraging anything for which the latter stood. He is an ardent foe of communism and gave me the impression of being desirous of maintaining the friendliest relations with the United States.

We must always remember that the Argentineans, perhaps more than any other Latin American people, are an extremely proud people. They want loans at reasonable rates to develop their potentially wealthy oilfields and to otherwise strengthen their economy. But they want these loans with no strings attached. In this respect they are behaving like all proud, freedom-loving peoples. We would be no different. If we recognize this fact and treat the Argentineans—as we must treat all peoples—fairly and squarely as equals, they can prove to be among our best friends in Latin America.

We have lost many friends in the Western Hemisphere and elsewhere in the world by giving the impression at times that we were a superior people, or by trying to outsmart in business and otherwise those whom we regarded as inferior. The sooner we correct these impressions, the better for all concerned.

From my conversations with President Frondizi and with Dr. Federico F. Monjardin, President of the Argentine Chamber of Deputies, I got the distinct impression that the Argentines have a strong admiration for their brother Americans in the United States, but they have a high regard for themselves, too. They want to join us as partners, not as servants to a master. In my estimation, they are most fitting partners and brothers as well. If we help Argentina now we risk nothing, but we shall have gained a very strong ally and a very valuable friend.

Finally, it should be understood that as the benefits of independence and economic self-sufficiency grow and continue to increase in the Latin American countries, they will want to align themselves —not with the Soviet Union—but with the United States, in order to protect their economic gains, their political freedom, their national independence, and the security of the whole Western Hemisphere. We have a marvelous opportunity here, let's not fritter it away.

To me, the race to better all mankind and life as we know it here on earth is far more important than the race to conquer other worlds. I believe that if world opinion were permitted to properly express itself, it would compel the search into the unknown, into other planets, to be directed by the combined efforts of all nations on this earth. In this way, the benefits or losses from such exploitation could be proportionately shared without unduly wasting the resouces, human and material, of the earth.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

In conclusion, I wish to express several acknowledgments of appreciation for the cooperation and assistance given me during my trip to South America. I am happy to report that our diplomatic representation in the countries visited is of the best. Ambassador Ellis O. Briggs in Brazil, Ambassador Willard L. Beaulac in Argentina, and Ambassador Robert F. Woodward in Uruguay are all careermen, each with an excellent background and understanding of Latin American affairs.

I also wish to acknowledge the inestimable assistance which I have received from the Moore-McCormack Lines, on whose ship, steamship Brasil, I made the trip, for allowing me to use their facilities in and out of ports in South America. Without their excellent cooperation, much of this simple report would not have been possible.

SENATE

MONDAY, JANUARY 12, 1959

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, who committeth to us the swift and solemn trust of life, so teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. Thou hast ordained that not in cushioned seats of safety, but in danger and stern conflict shall we find our strength, and our triumph, in these troubled days, when all mankind stands in the valley of decision.

Facing duties and responsibilities in this hallowed Chamber that far outweigh our own strength, and our own wisdom, as the world's hope of a bright tomorrow is entrusted to our frail hands, join us, we pray, to the great company of unconquered spirits who, in evil times, have stood their ground preserving the heritage of man's best, and whose flaming faith has made them as lighted windows amid the encircling gloom.

We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday, January 9, 1959, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

LIMITATION OF DEBATE DURING MORNING HOUR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, under the rule there will be the usual morning hour, and I ask unanimous consent that statements made thereunder be limited to 3 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, we are confronted with a very simple situation today. The Senate can do whatever the Senate wants to do regarding rule XXII. Nothing is required but a simple majority. Those who want majority cloture can have it—if they can get a majority to vote for it. An amendment providing for that is now the pending question before the Senate, and I expect it to be voted on before noon.

Those who want a reasonable modification of the present rule can have it—if they can get a majority of the Senate to vote for it.

I am not going to predict the outcome, Mr. President. I will leave that to my colleagues who were free with their predictions over the weekend. Each Senator will vote according to his own conscience, but the will of the majority will prevail. I am confident that the result will be a fair reflection of the will of the Senate, as well as the will of the Nation.

There is no doubt in my mind that the Senate can always work its will. In 1957 we passed—a Democratic Congress passed—the first civil rights bill to be passed by any Congress in 82 years, and we passed it by a majority vote. And, Mr. President, we passed it without cloture.

The 1957 bill did not satisfy everybody. It went further than some wanted it to go, and it did not go as far as some would have liked it to go. But there were clear-cut votes on almost every aspect of it, and it is apparent that the bill finally passed represented the will of the majority of the Members of the Senate and of the House. And in case further proposals come before the Congress, as I am informed they will upon the recommendation of the President, I am confident they can be handled in the same atmosphere.

There is no mystery, Mr. President, about the rules of the Senate. The rules of the Senate are intended to expedite the business of the Senate. They are intended to permit the Senate to help express its will.

In my judgment, rule XXII, as it stands at this moment, contains certain deficiencies. We can remedy those deficiencies. We are doing so in three respects.

First, we are clearly stating that we do have rules, instead of anarchy, and we are going to be guided by rules from one session to another.

Second, we are going to see that Senators must stand up and be counted; and, instead of having a constitutional two-thirds invoke cloture, require only two-thirds of those present and voting to invoke cloture. Therefore, Senators will have to stand up and be counted.

Third, we provide that cloture shall apply to all rule changes; and that meets the request and the argument made by so many people for so long—almost 10 years—that the weakness of the rule was that it did not apply to a change of the rules. So we are requiring that it shall apply to a change of the rules.

Mr. President, the Senate has a very heavy workload. As soon as we conclude the discussion of the one rule under consideration and arrive at a determination of the wishes of the majority of the Senate, we will proceed to offer amendments to other rules. It will not be very long, I hope, before we will be at work on substantive legislation.

I think it is a good omen, Mr. President, that we have started this year with the Senate voting on this issue. We are going to vote on it, in my opinion, in an orderly and an effective manner, without handcuffs and without force.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, perhaps it is according to the modern mood that we speak of so often in hyperbole. Language can become so immoderate and so extreme. I try to pursue the reasonable course and embrace the rule of reason.

I have the idea, Mr. President, that if the rule XXII never were changed, the Republic would not fall. I do not think it would result in the cold war being converted into a hot war. I doubt whether constitutional government would be destroyed. I have some doubt the Senate would disintegrate, or that progress would be halted, or that the cause of peace would be delayed.

On the other hand, by the same rule of reason, Mr. President, if the rule were reasonably changed, I am sure it would not invoke a civil war. I do not believe there would be any imminence of our destruction as a free country. I doubt whether there would be a rash of harmful legislation. I do not believe there would follow the destruction of free speech. I doubt very much if there would be world-shaking reactions.

We are merely trying to find a reasonable solution. In my opinion, this whole contest can be compressed by asking, "Just how do we make parliamentary bodies work? How do we prevent unwarranted abuses? How do we safeguard the minority? How do we secure reasonable and full expression on all subjects, and keep a reasonable brake on emotions of the moment?" I believe when all is said and done, that is the package which confronts us.

I think it is rather interesting that the newest Republic on the face of the earth faces a bit of a problem now. Our very distinguished Vice President was present when the Republic of Ghana was born 18 months ago. The constitution of that Republic was fashioned, in large measure, by British parliamentarians. They had a brake in the form of a two-thirds requirement before their constitution could be amended.

Mr. President, I am speaking now of Ghana, and you were there when that Republic was born. The Constitution of Ghana provides, I understand, for a two-thirds requirement before the constitution can be amended. That amounts to a two-thirds vote in the House of Chiefs, which is their parliamentary body, and two-thirds of their regional assemblies. I see that those in authority are now seeking to get that changed. There is a great deal of protest. The gatherings of the protesters have been broken up by the police. It is singular that that would happen in a country which should have an extraordinary interest in civil rights. I have read that the leader of 80 of the 104 votes in the House of Chiefs is determined that the safeguard of the two-thirds requirement shall be stricken from the constitution, for, as he said, it is too easy for the other side to challenge necessary social legislation.

As I examined the whole account, I said to myself that we are doing the reasonable thing here, so that no matter what may have been said, what position may have been embraced at some former time, this is still the reasonable course, and under it parliamentary government will work, and I do not believe the foundations of the Republic will topple.

I yield the floor.

MORNING BUSINESS

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is in order.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

EXTENSION OF UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING AND SERVICE ACT

A letter from the Secretary of Defense, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to extend until July 1, 1963, the induction provisions of the Universal Military Training and Service Act; the provisions of the act of August 3, 1950, suspending personnel strengths of the Armed Forces; and the Dependents Assistance Act of 1950 (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Armed Services.

REPORT OF NATIONAL MEDIATION BOARD

A letter from the Chairman, National Mediation Board, Washington, D.C., transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of that Board, including the report of the National Railroad Adjustment Board, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1958 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

REPORT OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION

A letter from the Secretary, Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C., transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of that Institution, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1958 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

PETITION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the petition of W. Hartpence, of Manila, P.I., praying for a final settlement of his claim against the United States, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MANSFIELD (for Mr. NEUBERGER):

S. 177. A bill for the relief of Donald Herburt French; and

S. 178. A bill for the relief of Wong Bick Quon (Maria Wong); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LAUSCHE:

S. 179. A bill for the relief of Jadwiga Adamczak Dembowski;

S. 180. A bill for the relief of Shunji Mihori and his wife, Chieko Mihori;

S. 181. A bill for the relief of Mary (Marija) Grom; and

S. 182. A bill for the relief of Yong Chul Jurgens; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. ENGLE (for himself and Mr. KUCHEL):

S. 183. A bill to authorize a project for the Buchanan Reservoir on the Chowchilla River, San Joaquin Valley, Calif., for flood control purposes; and

S. 184. A bill to authorize the project for the Hidden Reservoir on the Fresno River, San Joaquin Valley, Calif., for flood control purposes; to the Committee on Public Works.

By Mr. HILL:

S. 185. A bill to strengthen the Commissioned Corps of the Public Health Service through revision and extension of some of the provisions relating to retirement, appointment of personnel, and other related personnel matters, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

By Mr. HENNINGS:

CONTINUANCE OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON WASHINGTON METROPOLITAN PROBLEMS

Mr. BIBLE (for himself, Mr. MORSE, and Mr. BEALL) submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 2), which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Joint Committee on Washington Metropolitan Problems created by House Concurrent Resolution 172, agreed to August 29, 1957, is hereby continued through September 30, 1959.

SEC. 2. The Joint Committee is hereby authorized to make expenditures from February 1, 1959, through September 30, 1959, which shall not exceed $30,000, to the paid from the Contingent Fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the Chairman of the Joint Committee.

INVESTIGATION OF CERTAIN MATTERS BY SELECT COMMITTEE ON SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. SPARKMAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 16), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on Small Business, in carrying out the duties imposed upon it by S. Res. 58, Eighty-First Congress, agreed to February 20, 1950, and S. Res. 272, Eighty-First Congress, agreed to May 26, 1950, is authorized to examine, investigate, and make a complete study of the problems of American small and independent business and to make recommendations concerning those problems to the appropriate legislative committees of the Senate.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution the committee, from February 1, 1959, to January 31, 1960, inclusive, is authorized to (1) make such expenditures as it deems advisable; (2) to employ upon a temporary basis, technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants; and (3) with the prior consent of the heads of the departments or agencies concerned, and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to utilize the reimbursable services, information, facilities and personnel of any of the departments or agencies of the Government.

SEC. 3. The committee shall report its findings, together with its recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later than January 31, 1960.

SEC. 4. Expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $100,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

INTER-AMERICAN REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT BANK

Mr. SMATHERS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 17), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas the mutual interests of the United States and the Latin American countries can best be realized when the economies of the respective countries are in a strong and healthy condition;

Whereas the need for an Inter-American Regional Development Bank has long been recognized to assist in the economic development of Latin America;

Whereas the establishment of such a regional agency by the Latin American countries in full partnership with the United States would promote a better understanding of mutual problems by the participating countries; and

Whereas recent talks by representatives of the Latin American countries and the United States looking toward the establishment of such a regional agency provide a basis for hoping that this most worthwhile objective may be realized in the near future: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the establishment of an Inter-American Regional Development Bank is of vital mutual interest to the United States and the Latin American countries, and that every effort should be made by representatives of the United States in negotiations with representatives of the Latin American countries to hasten the realization of this urgently needed instrumentality.

AMENDMENT OF RULE XIX RELATING TO DEBATE

Mr. CASE of South Dakota (for himself, Mr. CLARK, Mr. BUSH, Mr. LAUSCHE, and Mr. BYRD of West Virginia) submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 18), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That rule XIX of the Standing Rules of the Senate, relating to debate, be, and it is hereby, amended by inserting after paragraph No. 1 of said rule a new paragraph No. 2, as follows:

"2. During the consideration of a bill, resolution, or other matter which has been pending before the Senate for 1 week or more, it shall be in order to offer motions that the Senate proceed with the consideration of amendments, which motions shall be privileged and decided with not more than 1 hour of debate, to be equally divided between opponents and proponents.

"If such a motion shall be determined in the affirmative, any amendment thereafter received, together with debate thereon, and all debate under the order for pending business shall be required to be germane to the subject matter before the Senate. All questions of relevancy under this rule, when raised, including appeals, shall be decided without debate."

Change the numbers of the succeeding paragraphs of the rule.

AMENDMENT OF RULE RELATING TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Mr. MORSE (for himself and Senators HOLLAND, TALMADGE, MOSS, MURRAY, CHAVEZ, LANGER, NEUBERGER, YOUNG of North Dakota, HUMPHREY, GRUENING, JAVITS, MARTIN, KUCHEL, CHURCH, ENGLE, BYRD of West Virginia, CANNON, KEFAUVER, MCGEE, KEATING, BARTLETT, RANDOLPH, and YARBOROUGH) submitted a resolution (S. Res. 19) to amend the standing rules of the Senate relating to standing committees, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

AMENDMENT OF PUBLIC INFORMATION SECTION OF ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE ACT

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the public information section of the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. 1002, section 3 of the act of June 11, 1946, 60 Stat. 238.

This bill seeks to restore the public information section of the Administrative Procedure Act to its original function; that is, to insure that the public receives adequate information from administrative agencies concerning their operations and procedures. It is an outgrowth of studies being made by the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights dealing with the subjects of freedom of information and secrecy in Government.

The Constitutional Rights Subcommittee has found that many agencies actually have been citing the public information section of the Administrative Procedure Act as authority for withholding information, and legislation clarifying both the purpose and the language of this section apparently is necessary if this practice is to be stopped.

Mr. President, this bill is identical with one which I introduced in the last Congress and which the Constitutional Rights Subcommittee has had under active consideration. Official comments already have been collected from various executive departments and administrative agencies, and the subcommittee plans to conduct public hearings on the general subject in the near future. Undoubtedly the bill can be improved, and its language refined—and I fully expect they will be—but meanwhile the bill should be valuable as a focal point of comment and discussion of the problems involved.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement I have prepared describing the bill in greater detail be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CARLSON in the chair). The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 186) to amend section 3 of chapter 324 of the act of June 11, 1946 (60 Stat. 238) to clarify and protect the right of the public to information, introduced by Mr. HENNINGS, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The statement presented by Mr. HENNINGS is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HENNINGS

In recent years, there has been an increasing tendency in this country toward secrecy in the conduct of governmental affairs. The trend toward secrecy has become so pronounced, in fact, that for several years the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, of which I am chairman, has been making a careful and detailed study of the extent to which restrictions on freedom of information may be infringing the constitutional rights of the people. We plan to continue this study during the coming year.

The staff of the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights has found many instances of what appear to be clearly unwarranted withholdings of information from both the public and Congress by various governmental departments and agencies. When the departments and agencies involved have been asked to show by what authority they justify such withholdings, they frequently have cited and attempted to rely upon section 1002 of title 5 of the United States Code.

If we turn to section 1002, however, and delve into its legislative history and the purposes for which it was enacted, we find no evidence that it was intended to authorize many of the limitations on the availability of information for which it has been cited.

It is to eliminate, or at least sharply curtail, the unjustified citation of section 1002 as authority for withholding information about public affairs that the following amendments to this section have been prepared. The effect of these amendments should be to force department and agency officials to seek proper statutory authority, or Presidential directives of indisputable constitutionality for their decisions to keep information from the public.

PROVISIONS OF 5 U.S.C. 1002

Section 1002 of title 5 of the United States Code presently reads:

"SEC. 1002. Publication of information, rules, opinions, orders, and public records.

"Except to the extent that there is involved (1) any function of the United States requiring secrecy in the public interest or (2) any matter relating solely to the internal management of an agency—

"(a) Every agency shall separately state and currently publish in the Federal Register (1) descriptions of its central and field organization including delegations by the agency of final authority and the established places at which, and methods whereby, the public may secure information or make submittals or requests; (2) statements of the general course and method by which its functions are channeled and determined, including the nature and requirements of all formal or informal procedures available as well as forms and instructions as to the scope and contents of all papers, reports, or examinations; and (3) substantive rules adopted as authorized by law and statements of general policy or interpretations formulated and adopted by the agency for the guidance of the public, but not rules addressed to and served upon named persons in accordance with law. No person shall in any manner be required to resort to organization or procedure not so published.

"(b) Every agency shall publish or, in accordance with published rule, make available to public inspection all final opinions or orders in the adjudication of cases (except those required for good cause to be held confidential and not cited as precedents) and all rules.

"(c) Save as otherwise required by statute, matters of official record shall in accordance with published rule be made available to persons properly and directly concerned except information held confidential for good cause found."

This section, enacted June 11, 1946, is the public information section of the Administrative Procedure Act. Its legislative history shows clearly that Congress intended that the section should serve as a means of insuring that the public would receive adequate information from government departments and agencies about their operations and procedures. As stated by the Senate Judiciary Committee in 1946:

"Section 1002 was drawn upon the theory that administrative operations and procedures are public property which the general public * * * is entitled to know or have the ready means of knowing with definiteness and assurance." (S. Doc. 248, 79th Cong., 2d sess. 198.)

It is ironic—but the studies of the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights show that it is true—that this statute, "drawn upon the theory that administrative operations and procedures are public property which the general public is entitled to know," frequently has been invoked by a number of departments and agencies as authority for denying information to the public.

Part of the explanation for this patent perversion of section 1002's original purpose seems to lie in the way the section presently reads. Some of its terms and phrases are undefined and somewhat vague, giving secrecy-minded officials far too much latitude in interpreting and applying them. Included among these terms and phrases are: (1) any function requiring secrecy in the public interest; (2) any matter relating solely to the internal management of an agency; (3) required for good cause to be held confidential; (4) matters of official record; (5) persons properly and directly concerned; (6) information held confidential for good cause shown.

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO SECTION 1002

The amendments now proposed are aimed at tightening the language of section 1002 by replacing these loose terms and phrases with language of more definite meaning, making it clear beyond any doubt that the basic purpose of the section is to insure the dissemination (not the concealment) of the maximum amount of information reasonably possible.

Section 1002 as it is proposed to be amended would read as follows:

"SEC. 1002. Public information.

"In order to provide adequate and effective information for the public—

"(a) Organization and forms: Every agency shall separately state and promptly file for publication in the Federal Register and the Code of Federal Regulations; (1) descriptions of its central and field organizations, including delegations by the agency of final authority; (2) statements of the general course and method by which its functions are channeled and determined, including the nature and requirements of all formal or informal procedures available; (3) descriptions of all forms for public use and instructions related thereto including a statement of where and how such forms and instructions may be obtained; and (4) every reorganization, amendment, or revision of the foregoing.

"(b) Rules: Every agency shall separately state and promptly file for publication in the Federal Register and in the Code of Federal Regulations: (1) all procedural rules; (2) rules relating to the availability of information to be public; (3) all statements of general policy or interpretation formulated and adopted; (4) all other rules; and (5) every amendment, revision or repeal of the foregoing.

"(c) Orders and opinions: Every agency shall promptly file its orders and opinions, or make them available to the public in accordance with a rule published in the Federal Register and the Code of Federal Regulations stating where and how they may be obtained, copied or examined. No order or opinion shall be valid or effective until it has been published or made available for public inspection.

"(d) Public records: Every agency shall promptly make available to the public, in accordance with a published rule stating where and how such records may be obtained, examined, or copied, all records, files, papers and documents submitted to and received by the agency. Public records include, but are not limited to, all applications, petitions, pleadings, requests, claims, communications, reports or other papers and all records and actions by the agency thereon, except as the agency by published rule finds that withholding is required by subsection (f) hereof. Every individual vote and official act of an agency shall be entered of record and made available to the public.

"(e) Effect of failure to publish: No rule, order, opinion, or public record shall be relied upon or cited by any agency against any person unless it has been duly published or made available to the public in accordance with this section. No person shall in any manner be required to resort to any organization or procedure not so published.

"(f) Exceptions: The provisions of this section shall not require disclosure of subject matter which is (1) specifically exempt from disclosure by statute, (2) required to be kept secret in the protection of the national security, or (3) of such a nature that disclosure would be a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy; however, nothing in this section authorizes withholding of information or limiting availability of records to the public except as specifically stated in this subsection."

These proposed changes should go far to make of section 1002 the public information section it was originally intended to be.

PERMANENCY OF PROVISIONS OF SUGAR ACT OF 1948

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and Senators BENNETT, LONG, MANSFIELD, ENGLE, DWORSHAK, CARLSON, PROXMIRE, CURTIS, HOLLAND, and O'MAHONEY, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to make permanent the provisions of the Sugar Act of 1948. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may lie on the table for 1 week, so as to give other Senators who may wish to do so an opportunity to join with me in the introduction of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie at the desk, as requested by the Senator from Lousiana.

The bill (S. 187) to make permanent the provisions of the Sugar Act of 1948, introduced by Mr. ELLENDER (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

BOMBING OF HOMES, CHURCHES, SCHOOLS, ETC.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, on May 28 and again on August 23, 1958, I introduced bills dealing with the repeated defiance of law and authority evidenced by a series of bombings in which homes, churches, schools, and community centers had been damaged.

These unlawful and outrageous acts have continued. Although the Federal Bureau of Investigation has cooperated with local authorities in the most recent outbreaks, they have been handicapped by a lack of authority to initiate their own investigations.

I know that all Members of the Senate and all citizens condemn this use of force and the attempts at intimidation which usually precede the violence. We must put a stop to it. Senator ERVIN and I are therefore introducing, together with Senators ALLOTT, ANDERSON, BIBLE, BUSH, BYRD of West Virginia, CANNON, CARROLL, CASE of New Jersey, CHAVEZ, CHURCH, CLARK, DODD, DOUGLAS, ENGLE, GREEN, GRUENING, HART, HENNINGS, HUMPHREY, LANGER, MAGNUSON, MANSFIELD, MARTIN, MCCARTHY, MOSS, MURRAY, PASTORE, RANDOLPH, SYMINGTON, YARBOROUGH, YOUNG of Ohio, and YOUNG of North Dakota, a bill which should provide the necessary machinery to outlaw these bombings. I hope that hearings will be held promptly and that action can be taken soon to enact the bill into law.

The widespread support, both intersectional and bipartisan, which the proposals embodied in the bill have already received, is an encouraging augury for the speedy passage of the measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 188) to prohibit certain acts involving the importation, transportation, possession, or use of explosives, introduced by Mr. KENNEDY (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts if the bill he is introducing is not, in effect, the same bill he introduced almost a year ago.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct. I believe it was the first bill to be introduced in the Senate on that subject.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I believe that since that time the Senator from Massachusetts has joined the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN], and the bill is now known as the Kennedy-Ervin bill. Is that correct?

Mr. KENNEDY. That is correct.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The bill now has approximately 40 cosponsors.

Mr. KENNEDY. That is correct.

Mr. MANSFIELD. It is anticipated that hearings will be held shortly on the bill, and that the bill or a similar one will be passed soon.

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes; it is my hope that it will be passed, because I believe the Senate, regardless of party or region, should pass a measure on that subject.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I commend the Senator from Massachusetts for taking the lead in trying to remedy this reprehensible situation, which affects all sections of the country, and I express the hope, as one cosponsor of the bill, under his leadership, that the bill will be reported to the Senate very shortly and be passed by both Houses and signed by the President.

I also express the hope that the penalties imposed, up to and including the death penalty, will be made a part of this very necessary legislation.

Mr. KENNEDY. I am delighted that the Senator from North Carolina has joined in the introduction of the bill, and I hope that we will receive prompt action on it in committee.

Mr. JAVITS and Mr. HENNINGS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would remind Senators that the Senate is operating under a unanimous-consent agreement, proposed by the majority leader, that statements be limited to 3 minutes. The Chair would suggest that Senators observe the limitation and ask for additional time, if necessary.

Mr. KENNEDY. I ask unanimous consent that I may yield first to the Senator from Missouri and then to the Senator from New York, for 1 minute each; then I shall yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I am very happy to be a cosponsor of the proposed legislation. I wish to commend the foresight and forehandedness and industry which always characterize the work of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, in introducing the bill. As a member of the Judiciary Committee, I assure the Senate that I will do all in my power to have hearings held promptly on it, and that we shall undertake to report the bill in as near to its present form as can be done.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator from Missouri. As a member of the Judiciary Committee, I know he will do all in his power to expedite matters.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Together with my colleague from New York [Mr. KEATING], and 12 other Senators on this side of the aisle, I introduced a bill with the same objectives as are sought to be accomplished by the so-called Kennedy-Ervin bill. I should like to add, also, that we compliment the Senator on his effort, and assure him of our desire to make the effort as bipartisan as we can in dealing with this situation of terror in some communities, a situation which is completely reprehensible and completely antithetical to every principle for which we stand with regard to religious freedom and personal freedom.

I extend to my colleague from Massachusetts the pledge of complete bipartisanship, without regard to whatever bill may be reported, in seeking consideration and in getting legislation passed, as well as in extending my very best efforts in connection with whatever influence I may have with the President in seeing to it that whatever bill is passed will be signed by him.

My colleague from New York [Mr. KEATING] and I have visited the sections in the South involved in this situation—as I am sure also that the Senator from Massachusetts has visited that area and is familiar with the situation—and we know that the authorities there have also been shocked by what happened. I therefore hope that the bill will receive early committee hearing and early floor consideration.

I again pledge to the Senator, insofar as I can, the complete cooperation of Senators on this side of the aisle in a completely bipartisan effort in getting the bill signed.

Mr. KENNEDY. I appreciate the Senator's statement. I know we are united in our desire to effectively deal with this problem.

AMENDMENT OF HOUSING LAWS

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], I introduce three bills to amend the housing laws, and ask for their appropriate referral.

On Friday of last week, the chairman of the Housing Subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee, the able and distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], introduced an omnibus housing bill which with some exceptions is identical with the bill which was passed by the Senate in the last Congress.

As a member of the Housing Subcommittee, I supported many of the provisions of that bill last year and am still in agreement with them. However, I felt that some of its provisions were inadequate last year and are still more inadequate this year, in view of the additional needs that have accumulated during the intervening period.

The bills I am offering deal with three subjects on which I urge that last year's bill be improved.

The first bill concerns urban renewal and housing of displaced families. It would authorize urban renewal grant reservations at the rate of $600 million annually for 10 years. This is in accord with the views of the mayors of the cities of America as to how rapidly the cities are prepared to proceed with urban renewal projects and put up their share of the money.

The expenditures under this authorization would not appear in the budget for 3 to 5 years, and would be spread over a period of 15 to 17 years.

The bill would also make certain revisions in the urban renewal program, based on experience to date, to expedite the program and make it fit better the needs of local planning.

Finally, this bill would meet squarely the critical problem of enabling persons displaced by urban renewal and other public action to obtain decent housing—first, by authorizing a greater volume of public housing; and, second, by a new program of private rental housing for those persons whose incomes are above public housing levels but too low to permit them to obtain decent private housing at the present time.

The problem of relocation housing has become critical because, under the law, urban renewal cannot proceed unless the families displaced can find safe and sanitary housing outside the urban renewal area. But the great bulk of families affected are in low-income brackets, and in most cities there is simply not now a sufficient supply of low-rent housing available to take care of the thousands of additional families that will be displaced as urban renewal and slum clearance proceed.

My second bill would authorize $250 million for the proposed program which would extend the college housing loan program to classrooms, libraries, laboratories, and other academic buildings.

My third bill would give the FHA authority, analogous to that which the VA now has, to intervene in order to prevent foreclosures in worthy hardship cases.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that these bills remain at the desk until the close of business on Wednesday, January 14, in order that Senators who wish to join as cosponsors may have an opportunity to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bills will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point the text of the bills, together with a section-by-section summary of each of the bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bills and analyses will be printed in the RECORD.

The bills, introduced by Mr. CLARK (for himself and Mr. KENNEDY), were received, read twice by their titles, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 193. A bill to amend and extend the laws relating to the renewal of urban communities, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Housing Amendments of 1959".

TITLE I. URBAN RENEWAL

Statewide planning

SEC. 101. Section 101(b) of the Housing Act of 1949, as amended, is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof a new sentence as follows: "The Administrator shall particularly encourage the utilization of local public agencies established by the States to operate on a statewide basis in behalf of smaller communities within the State which are undertaking, or propose to undertake urban renewal programs whenever that arrangement facilitates the undertaking of an urban renewal program by any such community, or provides an effective solution to community development or redevelopment problems in such communities, and is approved by resolution ordinance of the governing bodies of the affected communities."

Loan authorization

SEC. 102. Section 102(e) of the Housing Act of 1949, as amended, is hereby amended—

(1) by inserting after "respectively" the following: ", and on the date the Housing Amendments of 1959 become effective and on July 1, 1960, respectively", and

(2) by striking out "$1,000,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$1,500,000,000".

Early land acquisition

SEC. 103. Section 102(a) of title I of the Housing Act of 1949, as amended, is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence:

"In any case where, in connection with its undertaking and carrying out of an urban renewal project, a local public agency is authorized (prior to the approval by the local governing body of the urban renewal plan for such project) to acquire real property in the urban renewal area and to demolish and remove from any real property so acquired any buildings or structures located thereon, the Administrator, notwithstanding any other provisions of this title, may make a temporary loan or loans to any such local public agency to finance the acquisition of such real property and the demolition and removal of any buildings or structures located thereon: Provided, That no contract for any temporary loan for such purpose shall be made unless the governing body of the locality involved shall have by resolution or ordinance approved the undertaking by the local public agency of the acquisition of real property in the urban renewal area and the demolition and removal of buildings or structures located on real property so acquired: And provided further, That, in any such case, the local public agency shall not dispose of any real property so acquired until the urban renewal plan for the project shall have been approved by the local governing body of the locality involved and any contract for any such temporary loan shall so provide."

Grant authorization; repayment of uncollectible advances; grant reservations; community renewal programs

SEC. 104. Section 103 of the Housing Act of 1949, as amended, is hereby amended—

(1) By striking out the first sentence of subsection (b) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "The Administrator, on and after July 1, 1949, may, with the approval of the President, contract to make capital grants, with respect to projects assisted under this title, and to make grants pursuant to subsection (c) of this section, aggregating not to exceed $1,250,000,000, which limit shall be increased by $600,000,000 on the date the Housing Amendments of 1959 becomes effective and on July 1 in each of the years 1959 to 1967, both inclusive: Provided, That such limit, and any such authorized increase therein may be increased, at any time or times, by additional amounts aggregating not more than $150,000,000 upon a determination by the President that such action is in the public interest."

(2) By striking out the period at the end of the second sentence and inserting in lieu thereof a colon and the following: "Provided, That any amounts so appropriated shall also be available for repaying to the Secretary of the Treasury, for application to notes of the Administrator, the principal amounts of any funds advanced to local public agencies under this title which the Administrator determines to be uncollectible because of the termination of activities for which such advances were made, together with the interest paid or accrued to the Secretary (as determined by him) attributable to notes given by the Administrator in connection with such advances, but all such repayments shall constitute a charge against the authorization to make contracts for capital grants contained in this section: Provided further, That no such determination of the Administrator shall be construed to prejudice the rights of the United States with respect to any such advance."

(3) By adding the following new subsections:

"(c) Notwithstanding any other provisions of this or any other Act, the Administrator shall, upon application by local public agencies, make reservations of capital grants (in advance of the dates on which the authorization to make contracts for such capital grants becomes available pursuant to this subsection) which thereafter may be contracted for by such local public agencies as the aggregate amount of contracts to make capital grants with respect of projects assisted under this title is increased as provided for in this subsection, and may make advances pursuant to subsection (d) of section 102 of this title, for any project or projects to be carried out by such local public agencies with the capital grants so reserved to be contracted for by such local public agencies: Provided, That the amount of capital grants so reserved together with the amount of capital grants contracted for and the amount of all grants reserved or contracted for pursuant to subsection (e) of this section shall not exceed at any time the aggregate amount of capital grants and grants authorized by this subsection to be contracted for on July 1, 1967: And provided further, That anything in this subsection to the contrary notwithstanding, the Administrator may from time to time reserve from the amount of the authorization to make capital grants and grants as shall be available at any time, and from the amounts of such authorization as is still to become available, such amounts as he deems necessary to provide for a reasonable reserve for overruns and contingencies.

"(d) Notwithstanding any other provisions of this or any other Act, if financial assistance authorized by this title to be made available to a locality or local public agency may be made available to any locality or local public agency within the limitations provided in sections 102(e), 103 (b) and 106(e) and the second paragraph following the paragraph numbered (6) of section 110(c) of this title, the amount of such financial assistance made available to any locality or local public agency upon submission and processing of proper application therefor shall not otherwise be restricted and, so long as such financial assistance is so available, applications therefor submitted by localities and local public agencies shall be processed, so far as practicable, in the order of their receipt, and there shall not be imposed any limitations upon the size of any urban renewal project which, otherwise, meets the requirements of this title.

"(e) The Administrator may contract to make grants for the preparation or completion of community renewal programs, which may include, without being liimted to, (i) the identification of slum areas or blighted, deteriorated, or deteriorating areas in the community, (ii) the measurement of the nature and degree of blight and blighting factors within such areas, (iii) determination of the financial, relocation, and other resources needed and available to renew such areas, (iv) the identification of potential project areas and, where feasible, types of urban renewal action contemplated within such areas, and (v) scheduling or programing or urban renewal activities. Such programs shall conform, in the determination of the governing body of the locality, to the general plan of the locality as a whole. The Administrator may establish reasonable requirements respecting the scope and content of such programs. No contract for a grant pursuant to this subsection shall be made, unless the governing body of the locality involved has approved the preparation or completion of the community renewal program, and the submission by the local public agency of an application for such a grant. Notwithstanding section 110(h) or the use in any other provision of this title of the term 'local public agency' or 'local public agencies', the Administrator may make grants pursuant to this subsection for the preparation or completion of a community renewal program to a single local public body authorized to perform the planning work necessary to such preparation or completion. No grant made pursuant to this subsection shall exceed two-thirds of the cost (as such cost is determined or estimated by the Administrator) of the preparation or completion of the community renewal program for which such grant is made."

Public improvements by Federal agencies in urban renewal

SEC. 105. Section 105(b) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended by adding the following before the semicolon at the end thereof: ": And provided further, That, with respect to any improvements of a type which it is otherwise authorized to undertake, any Federal agency (as defined in section 3(b) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended, and also including the District of Columbia or any agency thereof) is hereby authorized to become obligated in accordance with this subsection (c), except that clause (ii) of this subsection shall apply to such Federal agency only to the extent that it is authorized (and funds have been authorized or appropriated and made available) to make the improvements involved".

State limitation

SEC. 106. Subsection (e) of section 106 of the Housing Act of 1949, as amended, is hereby amended by striking "$100,000,000" and inserting "$200,000,000".

Relocation payments

SEC. 107. (a) The first sentence of section 106 (f) (2) of the Housing Amendments of 1949 is amended to read as follows:

"(2) As used in this subsection, the term 'relocation payments' means payments by a local public agency to individuals, families, and business concerns for their reasonable and necessary moving expenses and any actual direct losses of property except goodwill or profit (which are incurred on and after August 7, 1956, and for which reimbursement or compensation is not otherwise made) resulting from their displacement from an urban renewal area made necessary by (i) the acquisition of real property by a local public agency or by any other public body, (ii) code enforcement activities undertaken in connection with an urban renewal project, or (iii) a program of voluntary rehabilitation of buildings or other improvements in accordance with an urban renewal plan: Provided, That such payments shall not be made after completion of the project or if completion is deferred solely for the purpose of obtaining further relocation payments."

(b) No relocation payments under section 106(f) of the Housing Act of 1949 shall be made for expenses or losses incurred prior to the effective date of the Housing Amendments of 1959, except to the extent that such payments were authorized by such section as it existed prior to such effective date.

(c) Section 106(f)(2) of such Act is further amended by striking out "$100" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "$200", and by striking out "$2,500" and inserting in lieu thereof "$3,500".

Low-Rent Housing in Urban Renewal Areas

SEC. 108. Section 107 of the Housing Act of 1949, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 107. When it appears in the public interest that an urban renewal project area should be used in whole or in part as a site for a low-rent housing project assisted under the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, the site shall be made available to the local housing agency undertaking the housing project at a price equal to the amount, as determined by the Administrator, which would be charged if it were disposed of to private enterprise for rental housing, with physical characteristics similar to those of the proposed low-rent housing project, and such amount shall be included as part of the development cost of the low-rent housing project: Provided, That the local contribution in the form of tax exemption or tax remission required by section 10(h) of the said Act with respect to the low-rent housing project into which such land is incorporated shall (if covered by a contract which, in the determination of the Public Housing Commissioner, and without regard to the requirements of the first proviso of said section 10(h), will assure that such local contribution will be made during the entire period that the project is used as low-rent housing within the meaning of the said Act) be accepted as a local grant-in-aid equal in amount, as determined by the Administrator, to one-half (or one-third in the case of a project on a three-fourths capital grant basis) of the difference between the cost of such site (including costs of land, clearance, site improvements, and a share, prorated on an area basis, of administrative, interest, and other project costs) and its sales price, and shall be considered a local grant-in-aid furnished in a form other than cash within the meaning of section 110(e) of this title."

Requirements for urban renewal plan

SEC. 109. Section 110(b) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended by striking out clause (2) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(2) shall be sufficiently complete to indicate, to the extent required by the Administrator, the general nature of such redevelopment, improvement, and rehabilitation, as may be proposed to be carried out in the urban renewal areas, the general land uses, and general nature of building requirements and density standards."

Nonresidential redevelopment

SEC. 110. Section 110(c) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended by striking out the second paragraph following the paragraph numbered (6) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Financial assistance shall not be extended under this title with respect to any urban renewal area which is not predominantly residential in character and which, under the urban renewal plan therefore, is not to be redeveloped for predominantly residential uses: Provided, That, if the governing body of the local public agency determines that the redevelopment of such an area for predominantly nonresidential uses is necessary for the proper development of the community, the Administrator may extend financial assistance under this title for such a project: Provided further, That the aggregate amount of capital grants contracted to be made pursuant to this title with respect to such projects shall not exceed 25 per centum of the aggregate amount of grants authorized by this title to be contracted for."

Local grants

SEC. 111. (a) Section 110(d) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of this subsection, no donation or provision of a public improvement or public facility of a type falling within the purview of this subsection shall be deemed to be ineligible as a local grant-in-aid for any project solely on the basis that the construction of such improvement or facility was commenced without notification to the Administrator or prior to Federal recognition of such project, if such construction was commenced not more than five years prior to the authorization by the Administrator of a contract for loan or capital grant for the project."

(b) Section 110(d) of the Housing Act of 1949, as amended, is hereby amended by striking out of clause (3) the words "and revenue producing public utilities the capital cost of which is wholly financed with local bonds or obligations payable solely out of revenues derived from service charges".

Credit for loss of interest

SEC. 112. Section 110(e) of the Housing Act of 1949, is amended by striking out the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(e) 'Gross project cost' shall comprise (1) the amount of the expenditures by the local public agency with respect to any and all undertakings necessary to carry out the project (including the payment of carrying charges, but not beyond the point where the project is completed), and (2) the amount of such local grants-in-aid as are furnished in forms other than cash. There may be included as part of the gross project cost, under any contract for loan or grant heretofore or hereafter executed under this title, with respect to moneys of the local public agency which are actually expended and outstanding for undertakings (other than in the form of local grants-in-aid) necessary to carry out the project, in the absence of carrying charges on such moneys, an amount in lieu of carrying charges which might otherwise have been payable thereon for the period such moneys are expended and outstanding but not beyond the point where the project is completed, computed for each six-month period or portion thereof, at an interest rate equivalent to the simple average yield per annum on new issues of United States Government ninety-one day Treasury bills issued during the ten weeks immediately prior to January 1 and July 1 of such six-month period: Provided, That such amount may be computed on the net total of all such moneys of the local public agency remaining expended and outstanding, less other moneys received from the project undertaken in excess of project expenditures, in all projects of the local public agency under this title, and allocated, as the Administrator may determine, to each of such projects. With respect to a project for which a contract for capital grant has been executed on a three-fourths basis pursuant to the proviso in the second sentence of section 103(a), gross project cost shall include, in lieu of the amount specified in clause (1) above, the amount of the expenditures by the local public agency with respect to the following undertakings and activities necessary to carry out such project:

"(i) acquisition of land (but only to the extent of the consideration paid to the owner and not title, appraisal, negotiating, legal, or any other expenditures of the local public agency incidental to acquiring land), disposition of land, demolition and removal of buildings and improvements, and site preparation and improvements, all as provided in paragraphs (1), (2), (3), (4), and (6) of section 110(c); and

"(ii) the payment of carrying charges related to the undertakings in clause (i) (including amounts in lieu of carrying charges as determined above), exclusive of taxes and payments in lieu of taxes but not beyond the point where such a project is completed; but not the cost of any other undertakings and activities (including, but without being limited to, the cost of surveys and plans, legal services of any kind, and all administrative and overhead expenses of the local public agency) with respect to such project."

Uniform date for interest rate determination

SEC. 113. Section 110(g) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended—

(1) by striking out of the first sentence "is approved" and inserting in lieu thereof "for any project under this title is authorized";

(2) by inserting in the second sentence after "Any" the word "such"; and

(3) by striking out of the second sentence (contract is revised or superseded by such later contract" and inserting in lieu thereof "later contract is authorized".

Conforming amendments

SEC. 114. The Housing Act of 1949 is amended—

(1) by striking out the word "capital" in section 100, the second sentence of section 103(b), and in sections 106(a)(3), 106(b), 106)(c)(6), 106(c)(3), and 106(e);

(2) by inserting in section 101(a) after the word "title" in the first place where it appears therein "or for grants pursuant to subsection (c) of section 103 hereof"; and

(3) by adding at the end of section 110 a new subsection as follows:

"(k) 'Federal recognition' means execution of any contract for financial assistance under this title or concurrence by the Administrator in the commencement, without such assistance, of surveys and plans."

Urban planning

SEC. 115. Section 701 of the Housing Act of 1949, as amended, is hereby amended—

(1) by inserting after the words "planning agencies" in the first sentence thereof the following: ", or to an agency or instrumentality of government designated by the governor of the State and acceptable to the Administrator as capable of carrying out the intent of this section,";

(2) by striking out the language in the first sentence after the parenthetical clause and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "to (1) cities and other municipalities having a population of less than 50,000 according to the latest decennial census, and (2) any group of adjacent communities, either incorporated or unincorporated, having a total population of less than 50,000 according to the latest decennial census and having common or related urban planning problems resulting from rapid urbanization.";

(3) by striking the period at the end of the first sentence and inserting the following: "; and the Administrator is authorized to make such planning grants directly to cities and other municipalities having a population of less than 50,000 according to the latest decennial census, except where the State planning agency certifies that a planning grant will preclude or impede planning on a metropolitan or regional basis in the metropolitan or regional area of which such city or other municipality is a part."

(4) by striking out the figure "$10,000,000" in the last sentence thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the figure "$25,000,000".

Surveys of public works planning

SEC. 116. Section 702 of the Housing Act of 1954, as amended, is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(f) The Administrator is authorized to use during any fiscal year not to exceed $50,000 of the moneys in the revolving fund (established under subsection (e)) to conduct surveys of the status and current volume of State and local public works planning and surveys of estimated requirements for State and local public works: Provided, That the Administrator, in conducting any such survey, may utilize or act through any Federal department or agency with its consent."

TITLE II. LOW RENT HOUSING

Statement of policy

SEC. 201. The first sentence of section 1 of the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"In the development of low-rent housing it shall be the policy to make adequate provision for larger families and for families consisting of elderly persons, and, where a local public housing agency has determined that the acquisition and repair, rehabilitation or remodeling of existing dwellings by the local public agency for use as a low-rent housing project is in the public interest of the community, to provide that the powers, functions and duties vested by law in the Public Housing Commissioner and the Housing and Home Finance Administrator shall be employed in such manner as will encourage and facilitate the undertaking and carrying out of such project by such local public housing agency. In the administration of low-rent housing it shall be the policy to vest in local public agencies full responsibility for the establishment of rents and eligibility requirements (subject to income limit ceilings hereinafter provided), the preparation of budgets, the control of expenditures, and the provision of such social and recreational guidance as is necessary in assisting families to become good tenants and citizens of the larger community. It shall further be the policy to authorize local public agencies to permit families whose income increases beyond the limits for continued occupancy to remain in their homes either through group or individual purchase, or as tenants paying a nonsubsidized rent if private housing is not available to them."

Rents and income limits

SEC. 202. (a) Paragraph (1) of section 2 of the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(1) The term 'low-rent housing' means decent, safe, and sanitary dwellings within the financial reach of families of low income, and developed and administered to promote serviceability, efficiency, economy, and stability, and embraces all necessary appurtenances thereto. The dwellings in low-rent housing shall be available solely for families of low income."

(b) Paragraph (7)(b) of section 15 of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(b) The Authority shall not make any contract for loans (other than preliminary loans) or for annual contributions pursuant to this Act with respect to any low-rent housing project initiated after March 1, 1949, unless the governing body of the locality involved has entered into an agreement with the public housing agency providing for the local cooperation required by the Authority pursuant to this Act.

(c) Paragraph (8)(a) of section 15 of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(a) the public housing agency shall fix maximum income limits for the admission and for the continued occupancy of families in such housing, and shall also fix the exemptions, if any, from net family income which shall be allowed in applying such income limits. In fixing income limits, the public housing agency shall determine (with the approval of the Authority), for dwellings of various sizes, the lowest annual rentals (or equivalent costs of owned homes), including the value or cost to the tenants of water, gas, other heating and cooking fuels, and other utilities, at which private enterprise unaided by public susbsidy is providing (through new construction and available existing structures) a substantial supply of decent, safe, and sanitary housing toward meeting the need of an adequate volume thereof. The income limits fixed by the public housing agency for families af various sizes and compositions shall be such that (A) no family shall be eligible for admission whose net annual income, less exemptions, exceeds five times such lowest annual rental, less 20 per centum, of a dwelling of the size needed by such family, except that in the case of a family entitled to a first preference as provided in section 10(g) 20 per centum need not be deducted from such lowest annual rental; and (B) no family shall be eligible for continued occupancy whose net annual income, less exemptions, exceeds five times such lowest annual rental of a dwelling of the size needed by such family. In determining eligibility for admission, the public housing agency may exempt not more than $600 of the income of each member of the family other than the principal income recipient and not more than the annual payments made by the United States Government to any member of the family for disability or death occurring in connection with military service; and in determining eligibility for continued occupancy the public housing agency may exempt (i) not more than the total annual income of minor members of the family, other than the principal income recipient and his spouse, (ii) not more than $600 of the income of any other member of the family, other than the principal income recipient, and (iii) not more than the annual payments made by the United States Government to any member of the family for disability or death occurring in connection with military service;".

(d) Paragraph (8) (b) of section 15 of such Act is amended by striking out clause (i) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "(i) had an income for eligibility not exceeding the maximum income limits fixed by the public housing agency;".

(e) Paragraph (8) (d) of section 15 of such Act is amended by striking out "(and approved by the Authority)".

(f) Section 502(b) of the Housing Act of 1948 is amended by striking out the last sentence thereof.

Use of existing dwellings for low-rent housing

SEC. 203. Section 7 of the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) Where a local public housing agency has determined and certified to the Public Housing Commissioner and to the Housing and Home Finance Administrator that the acquisition and repair, rehabilitation or remodeling of existing dwellings by the local public agency for use as low-rent housing, the Commissioner and the Administrator shall employ the powers, functions, and duties vested in them by this or any other Act in such manner as shall facilitate and encourage the undertaking and carrying out of such a low-rent housing project by such local public housing agency, and the annual report referred to in subsection (b) of this section shall include information on the number of such cases and the manner in which such functions, powers and duties were so employed and exercised in such cases."

Low-rent housing in urban renewal areas

SEC. 204. Section 9 of the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, is hereby amended—

(1) by striking out "Sec. 9" and inserting in lieu thereof "Sec. 9(a)", and

(2) by inserting at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) Where, as provided for in section 107 of the Housing Act of 1949, as amended, land to be acquired as part of an urban renewal project is made available to a public housing agency as a site for a low-rent housing project assisted under this Act an amount equal to the price for such land shall be included as a part of the development cost of said low-rent housing project and paid over by the public housing agency to the local public agency undertaking such urban renewal project as the purchase price for said land as provided in said section 107."

Residual receipts and audits

SEC. 205. (a) Section 10(b) of the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, is hereby amended by inserting in the third sentence after the words "persons housed," the words "encouragement of the use of existing dwellings for use as low-rent housing,".

(2) by striking out the proviso in the third sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided, That subject to the limitation hereinafter set forth in this proviso, annual contributions shall not be less than the amounts necessary, in the determination of the Authority, to assure the repayment of all sums borrowed by the public housing agency to finance the development or acquisition cost of a project together with the interest, as contracted for from time to time, on the sums so borrowed; except that the fixed contribution payable annually under any contract shall in no event exceed a sum equal to the annual yield, at the applicable going Federal rate plus 2 per centum, upon the development or acquisition cost of the low-rent housing or slum clearance project involved. The contract for annual contributions shall provide for their payment over a fixed period of years, to be determined by the Authority, which shall in no event exceed 40 years from the date the first annual contribution for the project is paid. When payment of all sums borrowed (or provisions for such payment) has been made, annual contributions shall cease."

(b) Section 10(c) of such Act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(c) Every contract for annual contributions shall provide that whenever in any year the receipts of a public housing agency in connection with a low-rent housing project exceed its expenditures (including debt service, administration, maintenance, establishment of reserves, and other costs and charges), an amount equal to such excess shall be applied to the repayment of outstanding developing or acquisition loans in connection with the project either through immediate repayment or establishment of a sinking fund. Every contract for annual contributions shall require that the public housing agency and its chairman shall submit to the Authority at the end of each fiscal year, a report containing financial statements for the fiscal year and an opinion thereon by the State auditor or other appropriate State official or by a public accountant of recognized standing based on an audit conducted in accordance with generally accepted auditing standards, and certify to the Authority that the agency has complied with the provisions of this Act. Such certification shall, in the absence of fraud or of evidence of waste or neglect, or expenditures which are not reasonably compatible with the operation of low-rent public housing, or extravagance, disclosed by financial post-audits pursuant to sections 814 and 816 of the Housing Act of 1954, and in the absence of evidence of violation of the provisions of this Act, be accepted as final and conclusive by all officers of the Federal Government: Provided, That no provision of this section limits or reduces the authority of the General Accounting Office to audit expenditures under this Act: And provided further, That, in lieu of such independent audit by any such State auditor or State official or public accountant and such certification by the public housing agency and its chairman, any public housing agency may, in its discretion, elect to have its books and accounts audited by employees of the Authority, and, if such election shall be made by the public housing agency and the Authority notified in writing thereof at least 60 days prior to the close of the accounting period, the Authority shall, in due course, audit the books and accounts of such public housing agency and shall transmit a copy of its audit report to the public housing agency."

(c) Section 22 (b) of such Act is amended by striking out in the proviso thereto the following: "proviso of subsection 10(b), or, where applicable, the second proviso of subsection 10(c)," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "sentence of section 10(b)".

Restoration of the Housing Act of 1949

SEC. 206. (a) Section 10(i) of the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(i) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no new contract for annual contributions for additional units shall be entered into after July 31, 1956, except with respect to low-rent housing for a locality respecting which the Housing and Home Finance Administrator has made the determination and certification relating to a workable program as prescribed in section 101(c) of the Housing Act of 1949, as amended."

(b) There are hereby repealed—

(1) Subsection (j) of Section 10 of the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended

(2) clause numbered (2) of the third proviso under the heading "Public Housing Administration; Annual contributions" of Public Law 455, Eighty-Second Congress, approved July 5, 1952";

(3) the last proviso under the heading "Public Housing Administration, Annual contributions" of Public Law 176, Eighty-Third Congress, approved July 31, 1953;

Over-income tenants

SEC. 207. (a) Section 15(8) of the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(e) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (d) above, the public housing agency may permit any member of a family which would otherwise be required to move under said paragraph (d) to enter into a contract (either individually or as a member of a group) for the acquisition of his dwelling unit or another suitable dwelling unit in any project of the public housing agency on the following terms:

"(A) the purchaser shall pay at least (i) a pro rata share cost of any services furnished him by the public housing agency, including but not limited to, administration, maintenance, repairs, utilities, insurance, provision of reserves, and other operating expenses, (ii) local taxes on his dwelling unit, and (iii) monthly payments of interest and principal sufficient to amortize a sales price, equal to the appraised value (at the time such purchase contract is entered into) of the dwelling unit, in not more than 40 years;

"(B) the interest rate shall be fixed at not less than the average interest cost of loans outstanding on the project, except that in the case of a project on which bonds are not outstanding the interest rate shall be fixed at not less than the going Federal rate applicable to such project;

"(C) the principal payments shall be not less than one-half per centum per annum of the sales price during the first five years after purchase, 1 per centum per annum during the next five years, 1½ per centum per annum during the third five years, and thereafter not less than the principal payments resulting from a level debt service of interest and principal over the balance of the payment period;

"(D) if at any time (i) a purchaser fails to carry out his contract with the public housing agency and if no member of his family who resides in the dwelling assumes such contract, or (ii) if the purchaser or a member of his family who assumes the contract does not reside in the dwelling, the public housing agency shall have an option to acquire his interest under such contract upon payment to him or his estate of an amount equal to his aggregate principal payments plus the value to the public housing agency of any improvements made by him, less an amount equal to 2½ per centum of the sales price.

"If the public housing agency determines with respect to any project that it is not feasible to enter into such contracts, it may permit a tenant family in such project whose income has increased beyond the limit for continued occupancy to continue in occupancy so long as (i) the public housing agency, after investigation (made at least annually), finds that it is impossible for the family to obtain through rental or purchase a decent, safe, and sanitary private dwelling suitable for its use and at a cost within its financial means, and (ii) the family pays a rental equal to the amount which it would be required to pay (during the first five years after purchase) if it purchased its dwelling unit under the foregoing terms of this paragraph (e). Actions taken pursuant to the provisions of this paragraph (e) shall not be deemed to violate the low-rent character of the project, and any such actions shall not be taken into account in making the determination required in the first proviso of section 10 (h)."

(b) The United States Housing Act of 1937 is further amended—

(1) by inserting before the period in paragraph (7) of section 2 the following: ", other than a project the title or possession of which is vested in the Authority pursuant to section 22";

(2) by inserting after the words "unless such project" in section 10 (h) the following: "(excluding any part thereof covered by a contract or conveyed pursuant to paragraph (8) (e) of section 15)";

(3) by inserting after "may be made" in section 10(1) the following: ", subject to any outstanding contracts made pursuant to paragraph (8) (e) of section 15,";

(4) by inserting after "acquisition" in paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of section 15 of the following: "(except pursuant to paraparagraph (8) (e) of section 15)"; and

(5) by inserting before the semicolon at the end of paragraph (1) of section 22(a) a colon and the following: "Provided, That such conveyance or delivery of title shall be subject to the rights of third parties vested pursuant to paragraph (8) (e) of section 15".

Payments for services

SEC. 208. Section 15 of the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(10) Notwithstanding any other provision of law or any contract or other arrangement made pursuant thereto, any public housing agency which utilizes public services and facilities of a municipality or other local governmental agency making charges therefor separate from real and personal property taxes shall be authorized by the Authority (without any amendment to the contract for annual contributions or deductions from payments in lieu of taxes otherwise payable) to pay to such municipality or other local governmental agency the amount that would be charged private persons, or dwellings similarly situated for such facilities and services."

Amendment of existing contracts

SEC. 209. (a) The United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, is hereby amended by inserting after section 29 a new section as follows:

"SEC. 30. Upon the request of any local public agency the Authority is authorized and directed to amend any or all of its contracts with the local public agency so as to bring such contracts into conformity with the provisions of this Act in effect on the date of such request: Provided, That contracts may not be amended or superseded in a manner which would impair the rights of the holders of any outstanding obligations of the public housing agency involved which are secured by any of the provisions of such contracts."

(b) Sections 30 and 31 of such Act, as they existed prior to the amendment made in subsection (a) of this section, are redesignated as sections 31 and 32, respectively.

Central administrative office facilities

SEC. 210. Paragraph (5) of section 2 of the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, is hereby amended by striking out the words "included in a low-rent housing project" and inserting in lieu thereof "in connection with its low-rent housing program" and by inserting after "1949" a comma and the following: "or in cases the public housing agency and the local public agency (as defined in title I of the Housing Act of 1949) operate under a combined central administrative office staff,"

Disposal and use of projects

SEC. 211. (a) Section 607 of the Act of October 14, 1940, as amended (42 U.S.C. 1587), is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection as follows:

"(h) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Administrator may, whenever he deems it desirable, in the public interest, and in the fulfillment of the purposes of this title, consent to the modification, with respect to purchase price, repayment period, rate of interest, time of payment of any installment on principal or interest, security, or any other term, of any contract, sale, mortgage, or other agreement to which he is a party, or which has been transferred to him pursuant to this title: Provided, That, in any such modification of a contract, sale, mortgage, or other agreement relating to housing projects heretofore disposed of as a whole or in other portions exceeding four family dwelling units per portion, under paragraph (c) of this section by sale to a group organized on a mutual or cooperative basis, the Administrator shall endeavor to make such modifications as may be necessary to enable such group to retain possession, wherever this result can be achieved without undue sacrifice of the interest of the Federal Government."

(b) The use of projects PA-36011 and PA-36012 (which were conveyed to the Housing Authority of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, under section 406(c) of the Housing Act of 1956) for the housing of military personnel and civilians employed in defense activities without regard to their income and the giving of a preference in respect to seven hundred dwelling units in such projects for such military personnel as the Secretary of Defense or his designee prescribes for a period of five years after the date of the conveyance is hereby authorized. Such use and the giving of such preferences shall not deprive the housing projects of their status as "low-rent housing" as that term is used and defined in the United States Housing Act of 1937 and within the meaning of that term as used in section 606(b) of an Act entitled "An Act to expedite the provision of housing in connection with national defense, and for other purposes", approved October 14, 1940, as amended. The Housing and Home Finance Administrator is authorized and directed to agree to any amendments to the instruments of conveyance required to give effect to the purposes of this Act.

TITLE III—RELOCATION HOUSING FOR DISPLACED FAMILIES OR PERSONS

SEC. 301. (a) The purpose of this title is to assist private nonprofit corporations to provide relocation housing and related facilities for displaced families, or persons, of low or moderate income.

(b) In order to carry out the purpose of this title, the Administrator may make loans to any corporation (as defined in section 304(2)) for the provision of rental housing and related facilities for displaced families, or persons, of low or moderate income, except that (1) no such loan shall be made unless the corporation shows that it is unable to secure the necessary funds from other sources upon terms and conditions equally as favorable as the terms and conditions applicable to loans under this title, and (2) no such loan shall be made unless the Administrator finds that the construction will be undertaken in an economical manner, and that it will not be of elaborate or extravagant design or materials.

(c) A loan to a corporation under this title may be in an amount not exceeding 98 per centum of the total development cost (as defined in section 304(3)), as determined by the Administrator; shall be secured in such manner and be repaid within such period, not exceeding fifty years, as may be determined by him; and shall bear interest at a rate determined by him which shall be not more than the higher of (1) 2¾ per centum per annum, or (2) the total of one-quarter of 1 per centum per annum added to the rate of interest paid by the Administrator on funds obtained from the Secretary of the Treasury as provided in subsection (e).

(d) To obtain funds for loans under this title, the Administrator may issue notes and obligations for purchase by the Secretary of the Treasury in an amount not to exceed $250,000,000 outstanding at any one time.

(e) Notes or other obligations issued by the Administrator under this title shall be in such forms and denominations, have such maturities, and be subject to such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Administrator, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such notes or other obligations issued to obtain funds for loans under this title shall bear interest at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury which shall be not more than the higher of (1) 2½ per centum per annum, or (2) the average annual interest rate on all interest-bearing obligations of the United States then forming a part of the public debt as computed at the end of the fiscal year next preceding the issuance of such notes or other obligations by the Administrator and adjusted to the nearest one-eighth of 1 per centum. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase any notes and other obligations of the Administrator issued under this title, and for such purpose is authorized to use as a public-debt transaction the proceeds from the sale of any securities issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under such Act, as amended, are extended to include any purchases of such notes and other obligations. The Secretary of the Treasury may at any time sell any of the notes or other obligations acquired by him under this section.

All redemptions, purchases, and sales by the Secretary of the Treasury of such notes or other obligations shall be treated as public-debt transactions of the United States.

SEC. 302. (a) In the performance of, and with respect to, the functions, powers, and duties vested in him by this title the Administrator shall (in addition to any authority otherwise vested in him) have the functions, powers, and duties set forth in section 402 (except subsection (c)(2)) of the Housing Act of 1950.

(b) The Administrator is authorized and directed to insure priority of occupancy to displaced persons or families in housing constructed with a loan under this title.

SEC. 303. (a) Housing constructed with a loan made under this title shall not be used for transient or hotel purposes while such loan is outstanding.

(b) As used in subsection (a), the term "transient or hotel purposes" shall have such meaning as may be prescribed by the Administrator, but rental for any period less than thirty days shall in any event constitute use for such purposes. The provisions of subsections (f) through (j) of section 513 of the National Housing Act (as added by section 132 of the Housing Act of 1954) shall apply in the case of violations of subsection (a) as though the housing described in such subsection were multifamily housing (as defined in section 513(e)(2) of the National Housing Act) with respect to which a mortgage is insured under such Act, except that for purposes of this section the Administrator shall perform the functions vested in the Commissioner by such section 513.

SEC. 304. As used in this title—

(1) The term "housing" means (A) new structures suitable for dwelling use by displaced families or persons, and (B) dwelling facilities provided by rehabilitation, alteration, conversion, or improvement of existing structures which are otherwise inadequate for proposed dwelling use by such families and persons.

(2) The term "corporation" means any incorporated private institution or foundation no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any private shareholder, contributor, or individual, if such institution or foundation is approved by the Administrator as to financial responsibility.

(3) The term "development cost" means costs of construction of housing and of other related facilities, and of the land on which it is located, including necessary site improvement.

(4) The term "displaced families or persons" means families or persons who are to be displaced by construction, development, redevelopment, or renewal activity undertaken by any public body, or by the action of a public body or court, either through the enforcement of housing standards or through the demolition, closing, or improvement of dwellings, or who were so displaced within 3 years prior to making application for admission to dwellings provided pursuant to this title. The Administrator shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to prevent abuses in determining, under the definitions contained in this paragraph, the eligibility of families and persons for admission to and occupancy of housing constructed with assistance under this title.

(5) The term "State" includes the several States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and the Territories and possessions of the United States.

(6) The term "Administrator" means the Housing and Home Finance Administrator.

(7) The term "construction" means erection of new structures, or rehabilitation, alteration, conversion, or improvement of existing structures.

(8) The term "family or person of low or moderate income" means any family, or person, whose net income is insufficient to enable such family or person to obtain, without the assistance of this title, decent, safe, and sanitary housing accommodations in the locality at rentals within the ability of such family or person to pay.

The digest accompanying Senate bill 193 is as follows:

DIGEST OF S. 193

TITLE I. URBAN RENEWAL

Statewide planning

Section 101 directs the HHFA Administrator to particularly encourage the utilization of local public agencies established by the States to operate on a statewide basis in behalf of smaller communities undertaking urban renewal programs.

Most small cities have neither the trained staff nor the financial support to hire a staff to initiate and carry through an urban renewal project. A trained staff at the State level can be of great assistance by helping smaller communities initiate and complete urban renewal projects.

Loan authorization

Section 102 would increase the present $1 billion loan authorization by $500 million, half of such increase to become available on the date the Housing Act of 1959 becomes effective and half to become available on July 1, 1960.

Early land acquisition and clearance

Section 103 provides that in any case where, in connection with its undertaking and carrying out of an urban renewal project, a local public agency is authorized (prior to the approval by the local governing body of the urban renewal plan for such project) to acquire real property in the urban renewal area and to demolish and remove from any real property so acquired any buildings or structures located thereon, the Administrator, notwithstanding any other provisions of this title, may make a temporary loan or loans to any such local public agency to finance the acquisition of such real property and the demolition and removal of any buildings or structures located thereon. No contract for any temporary loan for such purpose could be made unless the governing body of the locality involved shall have by resolution or ordinance approved the undertaking by the local public agency of the acquisition of real property in the urban renewal area and the demolition and removal of buildings or structures located on real property so acquired. Also, the local public agency could not dispose of any real property so acquired until the urban renewal plan for the project shall have been approved by the local governing body of the locality involved and any contract for any such temporary loan must so provide.

Grant authorization; repayment of uncollectible advances; grant reservations; community renewal programs

Section 104 would—

(1) Increase the present $1,250 million capital grant authorization by $600 million on the date the Housing Act of 1959 becomes effective and by $600 million on July 1 in each of the years 1959 to 1967, both inclusive, with discretionary power in the President to increase any such annual authorization by not to exceed $150 million.

(2) Authorize the Administrator to pay out of appropriated capital grant funds amounts equal to sums he has borrowed from the Treasury and loaned to local public agencies as advances for urban renewal planning, if these advances have become uncollectible. To obtain funds for advances for urban renewal planning, the Administrator issues notes to the Secretary of the Treasury. From the funds thus obtained, the Administrator advances funds to the local public agency for such planning. These advances are repayable by the local public agency as moneys become available for the undertaking of actual urban renewal projects. However, where the planning work is not completed or projects are not undertaken, these advances become uncollectible. This amendment would permit the HHFA Administrator to repay the Secretary of the Treasury for these planning advances including interest, and eliminate the necessity of having these debts carried on the books and accumulating interest indefinitely. It would not affect the obligation of the local public agency to repay the Federal Government if funds should become available through subsequent activation of one of the projects involved;

(3) Direct the Administrator to make reservations of capital grants (in advance of the dates on which the authorization to make contracts for capital grants becomes available) which thereafter may be contracted for by local public agencies as the aggregate amount of the authorization to make such contracts is increased on the date the Housing Act of 1959 becomes effective and on July 1 in each of the years 1960 through 1968. In the past the administrative practice has been to make no capital grant reservations beyond the amount of the portion of the authorization which had at the time become available. For example, if the total authorization was $1 billion, of which $500 million had become available with the remaining $500 million becoming available at the rate of $250 million in each of the 2 succeeding years, if contracts plus reservations equaled $500 million, no further capital grant reservations would be made until the next annual increment of $250 million actually became available. This is a serious impediment to cities able and willing to develop and carry out comprehensive programs. The difficulties have been further increased by the so-called "rationing program" instituted by the Administrator during the latter part of 1958 in placing arbitrary limitations upon the amount of grant funds allocable to any community. Under this section of the bill (after reserving a reasonable amount of the total authorization for overruns and contingencies), the Administrator would make reservations of capital grants for future contract by local public agencies up to approximately the full authorization, provided, of course, the total amount of grant contracts plus the amount of grant reservations never exceeded the total authorizations. Under this arrangement, cities can plan comprehensive urban renewal programs with the assurance that the financial assistance required to carry out such programs has been reserved out of the total authorization and will be available when their projects reach the grant contract stage; and

(4) Provide that, notwithstanding any other provision of law, if financial assistance authorized by title I to be made available to a locality or local public agency may be made available to any locality or local public agency within the limitations provided in section 102(e), 103(b), and 106(e) and the second paragraph following the paragraph numbered (6) of section 110(c) of title I (i.e., the loan authorization, the grant authorization, the limitation on the amount available in any one State, and the limitation on the amount available for redevelopment of nonresidential areas for nonresidential uses), the amount of such financial assistance made available to any locality or local public agency, upon submission and processing of proper application therefor, shall not otherwise be restricted; that so long as such financial assistance is so available, applications therefor submitted by localities and local public agencies shall be processed, so far as practicable, in the order of their receipt; and that there shall not be imposed any limitations upon the size of any urban renewal project which, otherwise, meets the requirements of this title I.

(5) Provide that grants may be made for community renewal programs.

At present, the Administrator may make advances of funds to local public agencies for (1) surveys and plans for specific urban renewal projects, (2) general neighborhood renewal planning, and (3) studies to determine the feasibility of proposed urban renewal projects. These advances cover the entire cost of planning work and are repayable solely from money becoming available when the contract is signed for a capital grant to the community.

Section 104(d) would add a new purpose for the use of grants, namely for the preparation or completion of "community renewal programs." Such programs would include (1) the identification of slum areas or blighted, deteriorated, or deteriorating areas in the community, (2) the measurement of the nature and degree of blight and blighting factors within such area, (3) determination of the financial, relocation, and other resources needed and available to renew such areas, (4) the identification of potential project areas and, where feasible, types of urban renewal action contemplated within such areas, and (5) scheduling and programing such urban renewal activities.

Federal assistance under this program would be limited to two-thirds of the cost of the preparation or completion of the community renewal program. The program must conform to the general plan of the locality as a whole and the application must be approved by the local governing body. Reasonable requirements governing the scope and nature of the program may be established by the Administrator to carry out the purposes of the program. These requirements are necessary because a survey of a community's total urban renewal needs could be extensive and involved.

The new "community renewal" planning would be financed through a grant rather than by an advance, as is the case with other planning funds. The Federal share would be two-thirds of the total cost, in keeping with the existing capital grant formula. The use of grants rather than advances would avoid the necessity of charging to one urban renewal project the cost of planning work which might be applicable to several projects. For some communities this would be an ideal way of proceeding before undertaking a specific project.

For other communities, however, there are reasons why citywide planning is not practicable and the community therefore would prefer to survey and develop plans for general neighborhood renewal, as provided in existing law. A community may also find it more practical to use planning advances to determine whether the undertaking of a specific urban renewal project is feasible.

Public improvements by Federal agencies in urban renewal areas

Section 105 authorizes a Federal agency (or the District of Columbia) to obligate itself and to agree to the statutory requirements applicable to redevelopers when purchasing urban renewal land. Every purchaser of urban renewal property from a local public agency must agree (1) to devote the property to the uses specified in the urban renewal plan, (2) to begin within a reasonable time any improvement of the property required by the plan, and (3) to comply with such other conditions as the Housing Administrator specifies.

In several instances where a Federal agency or the District of Columbia has sought to acquire such urban renewal land, it has been found that they lacked the statutory authority necessary to make the above agreements. This amendment would permit the District of Columbia or a Federal agency to make these required agreements. However, under the proposed amendment, neither the District of Columbia nor a Federal agency would be able to agree to item (2), above, only to the extent that it is authorized to construct improvements and has available funds.

State limitation

Under existing law, not more than 12½ percent of the funds provided for may be expended in any one State, except to the extent of $100 million. Section 106 increases the existing $100 million exception to $200 million.

Relocation payments

Section 107 would permit relocation payments to families and businesses displaced as a result of any governmental activity in an urban renewal area, and as a result of a program of voluntary repair and rehabilitation in connection with an urban renewal project. This provision would authorize payments by the local public agency out of capital-grant funds to families or business establishments displaced within an urban renewal area by such governmental activity as code enforcement and the construction of public roads, streets, buildings, or public works, even though they are not carried out in connection with the urban renewal project.

Under existing law, individuals, families, and businesses displaced from an urban renewal area are not eligible for relocation payments where their displacement results from the activity of a public body other than the local public agency (for example, where acquisition of a highway right-of-way within an urban renewal area is by the highway agency) or where displacement results from voluntary repair or rehabilitation in the urban renewal area.

This has created situations in a few communities where some displacees within an urban renewal area are receiving relocation payments and their neighbors across the street are not. To correct this inequity, the committee approved the extension of eligibility for relocation payments to all individuals, families, and businesses displaced by governmental activity from an urban renewal area.

The maximum payment authorized under the law is $100 for individuals or families and $2,500 for displaced business concerns. This maximum amount may compensate for reasonable and necessary moving expenses and any direct loss of property, except goodwill or profit, resulting from displacement. These would be increased to $200 and $3,500 respectively.

Low-rent housing in urban renewal areas

Section 108 amends section 107 of the Housing Act of 1949 to provide that where land to be acquired as part of an urban renewal project is to be used in whole or in part as a site for a low-rent housing project assisted under the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, the land to be used for such purpose shall be made available to the local housing agency undertaking the low-rent housing project at a price equal to the amount, as determined by the Administrator, which would be charged if it were disposed of to private enterprise for rental housing of similar character, and such amount shall be included as part of the development cost of said low-rent housing project, and paid over by the public housing agency to the local public agency undertaking such urban renewal project as the purchase price for said land. It also provides that the local contribution in the form of tax exemption or tax remission required by section 10(h) of the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, with respect to the low-rent housing project into which such land is incorporated shall be accepted as a local grant-in-aid equal in amount, as determined by the Administrator, to one-half (or one-third in the case of an urban renewal project on a three-fourths capital grant basis of the difference between the cost of such site and its sales price for public housing). (Corresponding provisions are included in the proposed amendments to the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended. See section 404 of this bill.)

Requirements for urban renewal plan

Section 109 would permit the Administrator to omit or simply certain planning requirements which are unrealistic or which cause unnecessary delay. The urban renewal plan must still be found to be sufficiently complete to indicate the general nature of such redevelopment, improvements, and rehabilitation as may be proposed in the urban renewal area, including the general land uses and general nature of building requirements and density standards.

The proposed language for the statute eliminates a number of specific detailed requirements and mentions only general requirements which may be broadly interpreted by the Administrator.

Nonresidential redevelopment

Under existing law, urban renewal projects assisted by the Federal Government must be predominantly residential, either before or after redevelopment. An exception to this requirement, up to 10 percent of the capital grant authorization, is allowed for nonresidential projects where the site includes a substantial number of slum or blighted dwellings.

Section 110 of the bill would change the exception to the predominantly residential rule by increasing from 10 to 25 percent the amount of urban renewal grant authorization that can be used for nonresidential purposes. The exception would only be permitted in areas where the governing body of the locality determines that the redevelopment of such an area for predominantly nonresidential use is necessary for the proper development of the community.

The present requirement that the site for nonresidential development must include a substantial number of slum or blighted dwellings would be eliminated.

Local grants

Section 111(a) would permit the acceptance, as a noncash grant-in-aid of local public improvements commenced prior to the loan and grant contract provided that the loan and grant contract for the project is signed not more than 5 years after the commencement of the local public improvements to be accepted.

After the plans are completed and approved by the Administrator, it seems reasonable that any public improvements in connection with an urban renewal project should be credited toward the local grant-in-aid for that project, if the improvements are started within a reasonable time prior to the loan and grant contract date. Five years was selected as a reasonable time because many projects require 5 years to develop from initial planning to final planning and approval. Communities should not be penalized for proceeding with public improvements required in an urban renewal area.

Section 111(b) would correct an inequitable situation resulting from the present law.

In general, under title I of the Housing Act of 1949, as amended, the cost of a public facility provided by a municipality and necessary for carrying out in an urban renewal area the urban renewal objectives of title I and in accordance with the urban renewal plan approved by the Administrator is eligible as a local grant-in-aid. Under existing law, however, the eligibility of a revenue-producing public facility depends upon whether its construction was financed by general obligation bonds payable from ad valorem taxes assessed against all real property in the municipality or by revenue bonds payable from the public revenues, derived from the service charges paid by all the users of the public facility in the municipality.

For example, assume that a new system of public water and sanitary sewer mains are required to be constructed in an urban renewal area. If such construction is financed by general obligation bonds, it is eligible as a local grant-in-aid, but, if it is financed by revenue bonds it is not eligible even though such revenue bonds are paid from the charges collected from all users of the system in the entire municipality (as distinguished from special assessments from the benefited real property).

The proper criteria in such type of case should be whether the citizens of the entire community (as distinguished from the owners of specially benefited property) bear the cost of providing the public facility. If the citizens of the entire community bear such cost, the particular method by which they bear it (i.e., taxes or service charges) should not be controlling as to eligibility for inclusion as a local grant-in-aid. After all, ad valorem taxes are no more than a service charge for services supplied by municipal government (such as police, fire protection, etc.) which, by their nature, are not in themselves revenue producing.

This amendment would permit the cost of such public improvements to be included as a local grant-in-aid when financed by revenue bonds payable from service charges against the users of the system.

To the extent that any public facility was financed by special assessments from benefited property in the urban renewal area, the amount of the cost financed by such special assessments would not be eligible for inclusion as a local grant-in-aid by reason of the third proviso of section 110(d) which provides as follows:

"And provided further, That in any case where a public facility furnished as a local grant-in-aid is financed in whole or in part by special assessments against real property in the project area acquired by the local public agency as part of the project, an amount equal to the total special assessment against such real property (or, in the case of a computation pursuant to the proviso immediately preceding, the estimated amount of such total special assessments) shall be deducted from the cost of such facility for the purpose of computing the amount of the local grants-in-aid for the project."

Credit for loss of interest

Section 112 would authorize the Housing and Home Finance Agency to include interest on advances by a city to the local urban renewal agency (local public funds) as an item of gross project cost for an urban renewal project. In most instances, the local urban renewal agency borrows funds from the Federal Government to undertake an urban renewal project. Interest on such loans obtained from the Federal Government is considered a proper project cost by the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

There are certain exceptions; for example, New York City, where the city has advanced its own funds to cover the original costs of the urban renewal project and has included interest on these funds as a proper cost in determining gross project cost.

The Housing and Home Finance Agency has questioned the city's claim to present these interest charges as a proper charge, and the General Accounting Office has rendered an opinion to the HHFA opposing inclusion of these charges without further legislative clarification and authority. The amendment contained in this section is intended to provide such legislative clarification and authority.

Uniform date for interest rate determination

The definition of "going Federal rate" in the Housing Act of 1949 is used as a basis for determining the interest rate on loans and advances for urban renewal projects. The committee has found that existing law inconsistently determines the applicable rate at different times for different types of contracts. One date (date is "approved" by HHFA Administrator) is provided for contracts executed after the enactment of the Housing Act of 1954; another date (date contract is "made") applies to contracts executed prior to the enactment of the 1954 act; and still a third date (date contract is revised or superseded) is used for amendatory contracts.

Section 113 of the committee bill would provide a single uniform date for the determination of the applicable going Federal interest rate. This amendment would fix the date for determining the applicable rate for all contracts as the date the contract, or amendatory contract, is "authorized" by the Administrator of the HHFA. Such authorization is evidenced by an internal allocation order, which allocates capital grant funds for the particular project. This allocation order would serve as a uniform and convenient date for determining the applicable interest rate. This change is merely technical and would not tend to either increase or decrease aggregate interest payments by localities.

Conforming amendments

Section 114 makes the required technical conforming amendments made necessary by the amendments contained in the other sections of the title.

Urban planning

Section 115 amends section 701 of the Housing Act of 1949 so as:

(1) To provide that, in any State where no "State planning agency" has been established, the Housing and Home Finance Administrator may extend assistance for urban renewal planning by making grants to any agency or instrumentality which is designated by the governor of the State and which is acceptable to the Administrator for operations under the program; under existing law such planning grants may be made only to "State planning agencies."

(2) To permit cities having a population of less than 50,000 to receive the benefits of the planning grant program; the program presently being limited to cities having a population of less than 25,000 and extend the scope of the urban planning grant program by including among the entities which may receive planning assistance through the State agency any group of adjacent communities having a total population of less than 50,000 and having common or related urban planning problems resulting from rapid urbanization.

(3) To authorize the Administrator to make planning grants directly to cities having a population of less than 50,000 except where the making of a direct planning grant would preclude or impede metropolitan or regional planning in the area of which the city is a part.

(4) To increase from $10 million to $25 million the amount authorized to be appropriated for urban planning grants.

Surveys of public works planning

Section 116 amends section 702 of the Housing Act of 1954 by adding a new subsection (f) to authorize the Administrator to use, in any one fiscal year, up to $50,000 of the revolving fund to conduct surveys of the status and current volume of State and local public works planning and surveys of estimated requirements for State and local public works.

TITLE II. LOW-RENT HOUSING

Declaration of policy

Section 201 amends section 1 of the United States Housing Act of 1937 to add the following policy objectives: that in the development of low-rent housing it shall be the policy to make adequate provision for larger families and for families consisting of elderly persons, and, where a local housing authority has determined that the acquisition and repair, rehabilitation or remodeling of existing dwellings by the local public agency for use as a low-rent housing project is in the public interest of the community, it shall be the policy to provide that the powers, functions and duties vested by law in the Public Housing Commissioner and the Housing and Home Finance Administrator shall be employed to encourage and facilitate such undertakings; that in the administration of low-rent housing it shall be the policy to vest in local housing authorities full responsibility for the establishment of rents and eligibility requirements (subject to income limit ceilings provided in the act), the preparation of budgets, the control of expenditures, and the provision of such social and recreational guidance as is necessary in assisting families to become good tenants and citizens of the larger community; and that authorization be given to local housing authorities to permit families whose income increases beyond the limits for continued occupancy to remain in their homes either through group or individual purchase, or as tenants paying a nonsubsidized rent if private housing is not available to them.

Rents and income limits

Section 202 amends several sections of the United States Housing Act of 1937 to permit local housing authorities to set rents and income limits for their low-rent projects, subject to a statutory ceiling on income limits.

Subsections (a) and (b) are technical, amending sections 2 (1) and 15 (7) (b) to delete provisions to be covered by other sections of the act.

Subsection (c) amends section 15 (8) (a) to authorize the local agency to fix maximum income limits for admission and continued occupancy. This statutory ceiling would differ from existing law in 2 respects: (1) the present $100 exemption for each minor or adult dependent is eliminated; (2) the 20 percent gap requirement is waived for displaced families. It also removes the Public Housing Administration's authority to require the prior approval of specific income limits set by the local agency.

Subsections (d) and (e) amend sections 15 (8) (b) and 15 (8) (d) to remove references to the Public Housing Administration's power of prior approval of specific income limits.

Subsection (f) repeals section 502 (b) of the Housing Act of 1948, relating to the exemption of benefits for disability or death occurring in connection with military service, which is incorporated in the basic act by subsection (c) above.

Use of existing dwellings

Section 203 provides that where a local housing authority determines and certifies to the Public Housing Commissioner and to the Housing and Home Finance Administrator that the acquisition and repair, rehabilitation or remodeling of existing dwellings for use as a low-rent housing project, the Commissioner and Administrator shall employ the powers, functions, and duties vested in them by the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, or any other act in such manner as shall facilitate and encourage the undertaking and carrying out of such a low-rent housing project by such local public housing agency, and the annual report of the Administrator shall include information on the number of such cases and the manner in which such functions, powers and duties were so employed and exercised in such cases.

Low-rent housing in urban renewal areas

Section 204 provides that where land to be acquired as part of an urban renewal project is made available to a local housing authority as a site for a low-rent housing project assisted under the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, an amount equal to the price for such land shall be included as a part of the development cost of such low-rent housing project and paid over by the local housing authority to the local agency undertaking such urban renewal project as the purchase price for said land. (Corresponding provisions are included in the proposed amendments to title I of the Housing Act of 1949, as amended. See section 108 of this bill.)

Residual receipts and audits

Section 205(a) amends section 10(b) of the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, (1) by including the encouragement of the use of existing dwellings among the appropriate factors which PHA may consider in fixing the maximum contributions which may be available under different circumstances, and (2) provides that (subject to the limitation that the fixed annual contribution may in no event exceed a sum equal to the annual yield, at the applicable going Federal rate plus 2 percent on project development or acquisition cost) the annual contribution shall not be less than the amounts necessary to assure repayment of all sums borrowed to finance project development or acquisition cost, together with interest thereon.

Section 205(b) amends section 10(c) of such act, (1) to provide that all residual receipts shall be applied to advance amortization of capital debt, and (2) to require local housing authorities to submit an independent audit by a State official or public accountant and certification of compliance with the act, and to provide that such certification shall, in the absence of fraud or of evidence of gross waste or extravagance disclosed by financial post audits pursuant to sections 814 and 816 of the Housing Act of 1954, be accepted as final and conclusive by all officers of the Federal Government, except that such provision may not limit or reduce the authority of the Comptroller General to audit expenditures under the act. Also, it provides that, in lieu of such independent audit by a State official or public accountant, any local public housing agency may elect to have its books and accounts audited by the PHA.

Section 205(c) amends section 22(b) to delete a reference which would no longer appear in the act, as amended.

Restoration of Housing Act of 1949

Section 206(a) would restore the original provisions of the Housing Act of 1949 bearing on the number of low-rent housing units which could be assisted pursuant to section 10(e) of the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, in projects initiated after March 1, 1949.

As to such projects not more than 810,000 dwelling units may be constructed. The basic rate for any one year may not exceed 135,000 dwelling units. Such basic rate for any year may be increased by the President up to not exceednig 200,000 units for any one year or may be decreased by the President to not less than 50,000 units for any one year.

Of the 810,000 units authorized approximately 370,000 have been completed, or are under construction or under contract, leaving a balance of about 440,000 units. However, at the current levels of construction cost and prevailing interest rates, it appears that the remaining annual contribution authorization would be sufficient to cover the construction of not more than perhaps 190,000 additional units.

Section 206(b) would repeal subsection 10(j) which was adopted in 1954 and which requires local authorities to pay over to the Federal Government and the local governments all of their net receipts from their low-rent projects after their capital indebtedness is liquidated. The 1954 provision if not repealed will have the effect of continuing Federal supervision and control of local projects even after the 40-year period during which annual contributions are paid. The proposed amendment would at such time vest the full ownership and responsibility for the use of public housing in the local authority where it properly belongs.

Section 206(b) would also repeal provisions in two old appropriation acts which limit the use of the authorizations in the Housing Act of 1949.

Overincome Tenants

Section 207(a) amends section 15(8) of the United States Housing Act of 1937 by adding a new paragraph (e) to stipulate the terms on which a low-rent dwelling unit may be sold to a public housing tenant. The tenant would be required to pay local taxes, amortize the full purchase price of his home, and pay interest at not less than the cost of money to the local agency. The local agency would have an option to repurchase a dwelling if the family fails to carry out its contract. This plan is permissive with local agencies. If any agency finds it is not feasible to operate under this plan, it could permit overincome tenants to remain in occupancy if the local agency determines that it is impossible for the family to rent or buy a decent private dwelling, and if an unsubsidized rent is paid.

(b) Technical. Amends the act in a number of places to make possible the sale of low-rent units.

Payment for services

Section 208 amends section 15 of such act to permit local public housing agencies (without amendments to their contracts for annual contributions or deductions from payments in lieu of taxes) to pay for local governmental services and facilities furnished such agencies the same amounts that would be charged private persons for the same services and facilities.

Amendment of existing contracts

Section 209 amends the United States Housing Act of 1937 by adding a new section 30 to provide that existing annual contribution contracts shall be revised, upon request of local agencies, in accordance with the terms of the act of 1937 as it is amended at any time, provided that the interest of the holders of outstanding bonds is not jeopardized.

Central administrative office facilities

Paragraph 5 of section 2 of the United States Housing Act of 1937 provides that in cases where the public housing agency is also the local public agency for the purposes of title I of the Housing Act of 1949 an administration building included in a low-rent housing project to provide central administrative office facilities may also include sufficient facilities for the administration of its functions as such local public agency, and in such case, the Authority shall require that an economic rent shall be charged for the facilities in such building which are used for the administration of its functions as such local public agency and shall be paid from funds derived from sources other than the low-rent housing projects of such public housing agency.

Section 210 would amend this paragraph to include cases where the public housing agency and the local redevelopment agency are separate legal entities but operate through a combined central office administrative staff. It is not intended to require that such building for combined central office staffs must be located on the site of a low-rent housing project.

Disposal and use of projects

Section 211 (a) amends section 607 of the act of October 14, 1940 (Lanham Act), to authorize the PHA Commissioner to modify the terms of any contract relating to any housing projects disposed of by him to cooperatives.

Section 211 (b) amends section 406 (c) of the Housing Act of 1956 to extend for a period of 2 years the time in which military personnel may continue to occupy war housing projects PA-36011 and PA-36012 (Passayunk) which are presently owned by the Housing Authority of Philadelphia, Pa.

TITLE III. RELOCATION HOUSING FOR DISPLACED FAMILIES OR PERSONS

Under this title, the Housing and Home Finance Administrator would be authorized to make loans to private, nonprofit corporations to construct, rehabilitate, or convert structures providing rental housing and related facilities for displaced families and persons of low and moderate income (including land acquisition and site improvement).

Federal loans for housing for displaced persons

Section 301(a) states that it is the purpose of the title to assist private nonprofit corporations to provide housing and related facilities for displaced families and persons.

Section 301(b) authorizes the Administrator to make loans to carry out such purpose, but provides that no such loan may be made unless the corporation shows that it cannot secure the necessary funds from other sources upon terms and conditions equally as favorable as those applicable to loans from the Administrator. The proposed construction must be undertaken in an economical manner, and must not be of elaborate or extravagant design or materials.

Section 301(c) limits any such loan to 98 percent of the total development cost of the construction as determined by the Administrator, with a maximum maturity of 50 years. Such a loan would bear interest at a rate not more than the higher of (1) 2¾ percent or (2) one-fourth of 1 percent added to the rate of interest paid by the Administrator on funds obtained from the Secretary of the Treasury (see subsection (e)).

Section 301(d) authorizes the Administrator to obtain funds for loans under this title by issuing rates and obligations for purchase by the Secretary of the Treasury in an amount not to exceed $250 million outstanding at any one time.

Section 301(e) provides that rates or other obligations issued by the Administrator, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury shall bear interest at a rate determined by the Secretary which shall not be more than the higher of (1) 2½ percent or (2) average interest rate on all interest-bearing obligations of the United States adjusted to the nearest one-eighth of 1 percent. The Secretary of the Treasury is directed to purchase notes or other obligations issued by the Administrator and authorized to sell any of such notes or other obligations. All redemptions, purchases, and sales of such notes or other obligations are required to be treated as public-debt transactions.

Powers of Administrator

Section 302 confers upon the Administrator (in addition to any authority otherwise vested in him) the same functions, powers, and duties (except those not appropriate for this program) as are vested in him for purposes of the college housing program under the Housing Act of 1950. Under the authority granted to the Administrator under this section, he would have power to make necessary rules and regulations, sue and be sued, deal in various ways with any property acquired or held by him, obtain insurance against loss, modify the terms and conditions of loan contracts (which may contain such covenants, conditions, and provisions as he deems necessary), and contract without advertising in certain cases, and his operations under the program would be generally subject to the Government Corporation Control Act.

Prohibition of hotels

Section 303 prohibits the use of housing constructed under the new program for transient or hotel purposes while the loans made under this title for such construction are still outstanding. The Administrator would define the term "transient or hotel purposes," but rental for any period less than 30 days would, in any event, constitute use for such purposes.

Definitions

Section 304 contains definitions of terms used in this title. The term "displaced families or persons" would mean families or persons displaced by construction or renewal activity undertaken by any public body or by the action of a public body or court, either through the enforcement of local codes or through the demolition, closing or improvement of dwellings. The term "corporation" would be limited to private, nonprofit corporations which are approved by the Administrator as to financial responsibility. The term "family or person of low or moderate income" is any family or person whose net income is insufficient to enable such family or person to obtain, without the assistance of this title, decent, safe, and sanitary housing accommodations in the locality at rentals within the ability of such family or person to pay.

S. 194. A bill to amend title IV of the Housing Act of 1950 (College Housing) to authorize loans to educational institutions for the construction, rehabilitation, alteration, conversion, and improvement of classroom buildings and other academic facilities.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That title IV of the Housing Act of 1950 is amended by adding at the end thereof a new section as follows:

"Loans for classroom buildings and other academic facilities

"SEC. 405. (a) In addition to the other purposes for which financial assistance may be extended under this title, the Administrator may make loans to educational institutions for (1) the construction of new structures suitable for use as classrooms, laboratories, and related facilities (including initial equipment, machinery, and utilities) necessary or appropriate for the instruction of students, the administration of the institution, or the conduct of varied research activities, and (2) the rehabilitation, alteration, conversion, or improvement of existing structures for the uses described above if such structures are otherwise inadequate for such uses. As used in this section, the term 'educational institution' means any educational institution offering at least a two-year program acceptable for full credit toward a baccalaureate degree, including any public educational institution, or any private educational institution no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any private shareholder or individual.

"(b) Any educational institution which, prior to the effective date of this section, has contracted for the construction, rehabilitation, alteration, conversion, or improvement of any structures for the uses described in subsection (a) may, in connection therewith, receive loans authorized by this section, as the Administrator may determine, but no such loan shall be made in connection with the construction, rehabilitation, alteration, conversion, or improvement of any such structure if the work thereon was commenced prior to the effective date of this section, or was completed prior to the filing of an application under this section."

(b) The heading of title IV of such Act is amended by striking out "Housing" and inserting in lieu thereof "Loans".

(c) Title IV of such Act is further amended by—

(1) striking out "Federal" in the heading of section 401 and inserting in lieu thereof "College housing":

(2) inserting after "loan" in clause (1) of the first proviso to section 401 (a) the following: "(including any loan under section 405 of this title)";

(3) striking out "A loan to an educational institution may be in an amount not exceeding the total development cost of the facility, as determined by the Administrator," in section 401 (c) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "A loan under this section to an educational institution may be in an amount not exceeding the total development cost of the facility, as determined by the Administrator, and a loan under section 405 of this title to an educational institution may be in an amount not exceeding the cost of construction of the structures involved (including related facilities), and the land on which the structures are located, as determined by the Administrator";

(4) inserting "(1)" immediately before the text of subsection (d) of section 401, by striking out "under this title" in such subsection (d) and inserting in lieu thereof "under subsection (a) of this section", and by adding at the end of such subsection (d) a new paragraph as follows:

"(2) In addition to the notes and other obligations authorized in paragraph (1) of this subsection, the Administrator may issue to the Secretary, from time to time and have outstanding at any one time, in an amount not exceeding $250,000,000, notes and other obligations for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of section 405 of this title,";

(5) inserting before the semicolon in section 402 (c) (2) a colon and the following: "Provided, That the Administrator shall extend fiscal assistance to educational institutions under section 405 only after consultation with such Office of Education"; and

(6) inserting after "For the purposes of this title," in section 404 the following: "except as otherwise provided in section 405,".

The digest accompanying Senate bill 194 is as follows:

DIGEST OF S. 194

LOANS FOR CLASSROOM BUILDINGS AND OTHER ACADEMIC FACILITIES

Section 1 amends title IV of the Housing Act of 1950 by adding at the end thereof a new section 405, authorizing the Housing and Home Finance Administrator to make loans to educational institutions for the construction or rehabilitation of classrooms, laboratories, and related fixed facilities and initial utilities necessary or appropriate for the instruction of students, the administration of the institution, or the conduct of varied research activities. Loans under the new section 405 would be made from a revolving fund which would be established by Treasury loans of a total amount not exceeding $250 million.

Sections 1(b) and (c) make technical and conforming amendments throughout title IV of such act in order to utilize the existing procedures and requirements of such title (already applicable to college housing loans) in carrying out the new classroom loan program.

S. 195. A bill relating to the foreclosure of FHA insured mortgages.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 204 (a) of the National Housing Act, as amended, is hereby amended by inserting immediately before the last proviso the following:

": And provided further, That with respect to any mortgage covering a one-, two-, three-, or four-family residence insured under this Act, if the Commissioner finds, after notice of default, that the default was due to circumstances beyond the control of the mortgagor and it is probable that the mortgage will be restored to good standing within a reasonable period of time, he may, under such regulations and conditions as he may prescribe, extend the time for curing default and enter into an agreement with the mortgagee providing that if the mortgage is subsequently foreclosed, any interest accruing after the date of the agreement which is not paid by the mortgagor may be included in the debentures".

SEC. 2. Title II of the National Housing Act, as amended, is hereby amended by adding the following new section:

"Acquisition of mortgages to avoid foreclosure

"SEC. 229. Upon receiving notice of the default of any mortgage covering a one-, two-, three-, or four-family residence heretofore or hereafter insured under this title, the Commissioner, in his discretion and for the purpose of avoiding foreclosure of the mortgage, may acquire the loan and the security therefor upon issuance to the mortgagee of debentures having a total face value equal to the unpaid principal balance of the loan plus any accrued interest and any proper advances theretofore made by the mortgagee under the provisions of the mortgage; and after the acquisition of such mortgage by the Commissioner such mortgagee shall have no further rights, liabilities, or obligations with respect thereto. The provisions of section 204 relating to the issuance of debentures incident to the acquisition of foreclosed properties shall apply with respect to debentures issued under this subsection, and the provisions of section 204 relating to the rights, liabilities, and obligations of a mortgagee shall apply with respect to the Commissioner when he has acquired an insured mortgage under this section, in accordance with and subject to regulations (modifying such provisions to the extent necessary to render their application for such purposes appropriate and effective) which shall be prescribed by the Commissioner."

The digest accompanying Senate bill 195 is as follows:

DIGEST OF S. 195

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR CURING MORTGAGE DEFAULT

Section 1 amends section 204(a) of the National Housing Act to authorize the Commissioner, where a mortgage covering a 1-, 2-, 3-, or 4-family dwelling insured under any FHA program is in default due to circumstances beyond the mortgagor's control and the default will probably be corrected within a reasonable period of time to extend the time for curing such default and to enter into an agreement providing for the payment to the mortgagee in debentures (if the mortgage is subsequently foreclosed) of any interest thereafter accruing.

ACQUISITION OF MORTGAGES TO AVOID FORECLOSURE

Section 2 adds to title II of the National Housing Act a new section 229, authorizing the Federal Housing Commissioner, for the purpose of avoiding foreclosure, to acquire any mortgage, covering a 1-, 2-, 3-, or 4-family dwelling which is insured under that title, by issuing debentures to the mortgagee. Upon such acquisition, the Commissioner would become the mortgagee, and the original mortgagee would have no further rights, liabilities, or obligations with respect to the mortgage.

AMENDMENT OF INTERNAL REVENUE CODE OF 1954, RELATING TO NONRECOGNITION OF GAIN OR LOSS UPON CERTAIN DISTRIBUTIONS OF STOCK

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 so as to provide for nonrecognition of gain or loss upon certain distributions of stock made pursuant to orders enforcing the antitrust laws.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 200) to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 so as to provide for nonrecognition of gain or loss upon certain distributions of stock made pursuant to orders enforcing the antitrust laws, introduced by Mr. FREAR, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, in the latter days of the 85th Congress I advised the Senate of my intention to reintroduce early this year a bill which I first offered last June.

This proposed legislation which I now again introduce is to facilitate the administration of antitrust policy by correcting a serious inequity in our tax laws.

At an appropriate early date, I shall request the Finance Committee to hold hearings on this meritorious proposal, following which I am certain it will receive approval of both the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. President, when I first introduced this bill last year, I did not press for immediate hearings, believing instead that the appropriate Federal agencies would naturally desire a reasonable amount of time to examine its provisions.

The intervening 8 months have, I trust, been sufficient for this purpose, and I hope that these agencies will now be in a position to give their support in view of precedents established by the bank and utility holding company acts.

The problem presented, Mr. President, is technical and rather difficult to present in laymen's language.

In the interest of the Senate's time I shall not go into the matter in detail at this time, except to say, by way of brief explanation, that literally hundreds of our business concerns own stock in other businesses.

Generally speaking, if they distribute this stock to their own shareholders, the distribution is treated for tax purposes under existing law as a dividend.

The Congress has recognized, Mr. President, that when legislation in the public interest is enacted which requires a corporation to make such distributions, the imposition of ordinary income tax at that time would be unfair and inequitable.

As long ago as 1938, Congress acted to postpone the tax on distribution made in obedience to orders of the Securities and Exchange Commission under the Public Utility Holding Company Act, until the time when the recipient sells the stock.

As recently as 1956, Congress followed this precedent and wrote it into the Bank Holding Company Act with respect to involuntary distributions required by that legislation.

Thus, when Congress has enacted new law in the public interest, it has taken steps to protect citizens from unjustified taxation.

In the antitrust field, however, Congress has written statutes so broad so virtually to delegate legislative powers to the judiciary.

When, in exercising these powers, the courts feel they must order a corporation to distribute the stock of another corporation to its own stockholders, there is no way for the judiciary to provide tax relief.

My bill, if enacted, would extend to antitrust proceedings the protection which Congress has insisted upon in the other instances I have cited.

There would be no exemption from tax when the stockholder sells the stock, but its receipt would not be subject to income tax.

It is as simple as that.

The need for prompt action is emphasized by the Du Pont-General Motors case, but the problem is a continuing one involving antitrust enforcement for many years to come.

More than 40 years ago, the Du Pont Co., which then was owned by 7,200 stockholders, made a substantial investment in shares of the General Motors Corp.

Two years ago the Supreme Court by a 4-to-2 vote held that through this investment there is a "reasonable probability" of restraint in future trade relations of the two companies.

The case was returned to the lower courts for determination of a remedy, and the remedy asked by the Justice Department is a court order for the sale of one-third of this General Motors investment, on behalf of certain Du Pont common stockholders, and distribution of the remainder to the other Du Pont common shareholders on a pro rata basis.

Today there are 194,000 holders of Du Pont's common stock.

They include nearly 15,000 of my Delaware constituents, as well as constituents of every one of my colleagues who purchased this stock in good faith.

They paid a price for it which included their proportionate equity in Du Pont's General Motors holdings.

If the Court should order the Justice Department proposal into effect, a Du Pont stockholder would receive his pro rata share of Du Pont's 63 million shares of General Motors stock.

He would have two pieces of paper instead of one, and the value of his Du Pont stock would be reduced proportionately to the value of the General Motors stock received.

He would be no richer, Mr. President, but he would be poorer.

For the stockholders would collectively be subject to a tax estimated at $700 million.

Each individual shareholder would be subject to a Federal tax, not to mention State taxes, of from $5.60 to $30.45 or more for each share of Du Pont stock owned, assuming a market value of only $35 a share for General Motors.

I am very deeply concerned that other economic consequences could be even more disastrous, for competent financial analysts have estimated that forced sales would result in a $5 billion drop in the market value of Du Pont and General Motors stock.

Surely, Mr. President, this is grossly unfair to the 194,000 Du Pont stockholders, including 47,500 company employees in 27 States, who are innocent of any law violation or wrongdoing.

It is likewise unfair to the 322 insurance companies, the 1,234 charitable organizations, the 518 educational institutions, and the 119 fraternal organizations which own Du Pont stock.

And, it is similarly unjust to the more than 700,000 shareholders of General Motors, who also include similar institutions in ever larger numbers.

This is the penalty proposed—not upon the two companies, but upon innocent individuals and institutions.

Mr. President, the majority opinion of the Supreme Court in this case did not suggest penalties, but merely asked for a determination of the equitable relief necessary and appropriate in the public interest to eliminate the effects of the acquisition.

Only Congress has the power to make the relief sought by the Department of Justice possible without unwarranted injury to our citizens and the economy, in line with the precedents it has established in the past.

We should act, and act promptly, to give all parties in this case, as well as future cases certain to arise, the benefit of a simple solution which is fair to the Government, and to its citizens.

CONSTRUCTION OF DAM ON POTOMAC RIVER BY POTOMAC ELECTRIC POWER CO.

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and my colleague, the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. BUTLER], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize the Potomac Electric Power Co. to construct, maintain, and operate, at its own expense, a dam on the Potomac River at a specified point.

The location of the proposed dam is suitable to the interests of navigation; it is approximately three-fourths of a mile downstream from the confluence of the Potomac and Monocacy Rivers in Montgomery County, Md.

Mr. President, as most of my colleagues are aware, Potomac Electric Power Co. is busily engaged in the construction of a new electric energy generating plant at Dickerson, Md., in the area near where the proposed dam would be constructed. The company has already expended between 22 and 23 million dollars on the construction of this plant. The first 175,000-kilowatt unit will start operations this summer, and the second should be in operation in 1960. With the completion of the two units, the company will have expended about $55 million on this new and modern generating plant.

However, in order that electric energy consumers in Maryland and in the entire Potomac Electric Power Co. service area may have the maximum use of the plant, the company should be able to construct two additional units, but it will be impossible to do so unless the proposed dam is authorized and constructed. This is necessary in order that the plant may have available the additional water which would be provided by the proposed dam.

The third and fourth units would mean an additional expenditure of vast amounts of money on the part of the company.

I should point out here that the proposed legislation is in a form which is agreeable to the Department of the Army, Corps of Engineers. In fact, the location of the plant at Dickerson, Md., was decided after consultation with the Corps of Engineers. In addition, the legislation requires that the plans for the dam must be submitted to and approved by the Secretary of the Army and the Chief of Engineers.

The amazing growth of this area demands that the third and fourth units at the Dickerson plant be completed at the earliest possible date. The early enactment of this legislation will expedite the planning and completion of these vitally needed units. I urge the committee to which this legislation will be referred to hold early hearings on the proposed legislation to the end that the Senate may pass it at the earliest possible date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 223) granting the consent of Congress to the Potomac Electric Power Co. for the construction of a dam on the Potomac River, introduced by Mr. BEALL (for himself and Mr. BUTLER), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Works.

USE OF SURPLUS AGRICULTURAL COMMODITIES IN CARRYING OUT CERTAIN FOREIGN AID PROGRAMS

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Mutual Security Act so as to require greater use of surplus agricultural commodities in carrying out certain foreign aid programs.

For more than 10 years the United States has endeavored to aid nations of the free world so as to improve their position and their ability to contribute to the common goal of world peace and progress.

Our foreign aid programs have made significant contributions to that goal.

In view of the current world situation, and the prospects for the future, it would seem apparent that the need for certain types of foreign aid will continue.

In light of this prospect, it is important that the mutual security program be continually reviewed as to possible improvements of perfections in line with changing circumstances.

Mr. President, the bill which I have introduced endeavors to modify the Mutual Security Act in accordance with developments in our domestic agricultural situation.

The productive capacity of American agriculture is well known. Our 5 million farms are able to produce, and have been producing more food and fiber than our own population uses, and more than we have been exporting. Hence, inventories of surplus farm commodities have been accumulating.

All reliable estimates point to a continuation of this situation for some years to come.

Improperly used, this productive capacity can become an economic cancer—not only to agriculture but to the entire Nation.

On the other hand, if used wisely, our surplus production can be an important tool in furthering the aims and goals of our country and the entire free world.

The bill I have just introduced recognizes this fact, as well as the prospect of continuing agricultural surpluses and continuing need for foreign aid.

The bill requires that, beginning with fiscal year 1960, 25 percent of the funds available for the mutual security programs—excepting military assistance and the Development Loan Fund, shall be used to finance export and sale of surplus agriculture commodities. The funds generated through this action would be used in accordance with the general purposes of the Mutual Security Act.

Under the present language of the act, section 402, $175 million is earmarked for this purpose.

Under my proposed change, the funds available would be geared to a certain percentage of the total.

In the current fiscal year, the proposed language would result in a substantial increase in funds available under section 402.

I believe the increased use of surplus farm commodities in our foreign aid is desirable, particularly in view of the long-term prospects for a continuation of each.

Therefore, I respectfully request Members of the Senate to give this proposal full consideration.

AMENDMENT OF SOCIAL SECURITY ACT RELATING TO PAYMENT OF BENEFITS AT AGE 60

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Social Security Act which provides that full benefits will be paid to our people when they reach 60 years of age. I have received a tremendous amount of mail from constituents in North Dakota and from citizens in other parts of the country, who maintain that the present law should be amended to lower the age to 60 years of age, because of the many hardships that confront those depending upon social security who must wait the additional years to qualify under the present law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 233) to amend title II of the Social Security Act to provide that full benefits thereunder, when based upon the attainment of retirement age, will be payable to individuals at age 60, introduced by Mr. LANGER, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

LOANS TO INDIVIDUALS TO OBTAIN A COLLEGE OR UNIVERSITY EDUCATION

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to provide that any high-school graduate may receive a loan to obtain a college or university education.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 234) to provide for loans to individuals for the purpose of enabling them to obtain a college or university education, introduced by Mr. LANGER, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

RELIEF FROM LIABILITY FOR REPAYMENT OF AMOUNTS ERRONEOUSLY PAID TO CERTAIN VETERANS

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and my colleague, the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to relieve veterans from liability for repayment of amounts which were erroneously paid to them while a member of the Armed Forces.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 235) to relieve certain veterans from liability for repayment of amounts erroneously paid to them while members of the Armed Forces, introduced by Mr. LANGER (for himself and Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DINOSAUR NATIONAL PARK, COLO. AND UTAH

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, last Friday I introduced a bill S. 160 to establish Dinosaur National Park as our 30th national park. It would encompass that area now operated as a national monument in Utah and Colorado. The press of Senate business on Friday precluded my making this statement at that time.

This bill is virtually the same as S. 2577 which I sponsored in the 85th Congress. The earlier bill provided for a substantial expansion of the monument area while, under S. 160, the park boundaries would coincide with the present monument boundaries. Additionally, section 3 of the revised bill contains some minor changes as to the authority of the Secretary of the Interior concerning acceptance of lands for access roads into the park.

In this area, the Green and Yampa Rivers slash through picturesque gorges to come together deep in a canyon to form the great Colorado River. I believe strongly that this remote and beautiful scenery warrants the development, the accessibility, and the prestige which park status would bring.

Those who live in the region remember, as do many others, the controversy over authorization of the Echo Park Dam within the borders of Dinosaur Monument. I am one of those who sought construction of that dam. As to my current feelings in this regard they are unchanged since July 17, 1957, at which time I said, in introducing the earlier bill:

For a brief period of time in its recent history Dinosaur was a controversial area, because it was to be the site of Echo Park Dam, one of the units of the upper Colorado River development. When this projected dam, important though it was to the project, became a matter of widespread public interest, the Congress subsequently eliminated it from the development so that the area would be preserved in its natural state.

As one of the proponents of the upper Colorado River storage project, including the Echo Park Dam, I have in this bill purposely omitted reference to power withdrawals, preferring to leave that issue where it stands. One Congress cannot bind a future Congress. We are not foresighted enough to determine for all time the best interests of the people of this country. The only purpose of this bill is to give national park status to this remarkable area, and to make available its great scenic values to millions of Americans to whom it is nothing more than a name.

Many of us, in and out of Congress, believe that we should now recognize the popularity of this remarkable area by making it, through congressional action, a full-fledged national park.

Hearings on my proposal have already been held—by the Senate Interior Committee on July 8, 1958. With this in mind, it is my hope that we may be able to proceed promptly to favorable consideration of this important bill, S. 160.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in full in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to preserve in a natural condition as a national park for the benefit and inspiration of present and future generations, the nationally important scenic grandeur, geologic phenomena, and scientific features of those portions of the canyons of the Yampa and Green Rivers that are now contained in the Dinosaur National Monument, Colo. and Utah, there is hereby established, as described in section 2 of this act, the Dinosaur National Park.

Such national park shall be preserved, protected, and administered by the Secretary of the Interior for the benefit of present and future generations in accordance with the basic policies established by the Congress for the preservation of the national parks, pursuant to the act of August 25, 1916 (39 Stat. 535; 16 U.S.C., 1946 ed., secs. 1–3), as amended and supplemented. Nothing contained in this act shall preclude the Secretary of the Interior from investigating, under the authority invested in him by the Federal reclamation laws, the suitability of reservoir and canal sites within Dinosaur National Park for development under those laws with a view to reporting thereon to the President and the Congress, but no such development shall be undertaken by the Secretary except under an act of Congress specifically authorizing the same.

SEC. 2. The Dinosaur National Park, as established pursuant to this act shall include, subject to valid existing rights, those lands in the States of Colorado and Utah, described as follows:

Beginning at a point on the Utah-Colorado boundary line at the northeast corner of section 12, township 3 south, range 25 east, Salt Lake meridian;

Thence westerly along section lines to the northwest corner of the east half of section 11;

Thence southerly along the west line of the east halves of sections 11 and 14, to the southwest corner of the east half of said section 14;

Thence westerly along section lines to the northwest corner of section 20;

Thence southerly along the section line to the southwest corner of said section 20;

Thence westerly along section lines to the northwest corner of section 26, to township 3 south, range 24 east;

Thence southerly along section lines to the southwest corner of section 35;

Thence westerly along the section line to the northwest corner of section 3, township 4 south, range 24 east;

Thence southerly along the section line to the southwest corner of said section 3;

Thence westerly along section lines to the northwest corner of what will probably be when surveyed section 7, township 4 south, range 24 east;

Thence northerly along the section line to the northeast corner of section 12, township 4 south, range 23 east;

Thence westerly along section lines to the northwest corner of section 9;

Thence southerly along section lines to the southwest corner of section 28;

Thence easterly along the south line of said section 28 to the right bank of the Green River;

Thence upstream along the right bank of the Green River to the intersection with the east line of section 35;

Thence northerly along the east line of section 35 to the northeast corner of said section 35;

Thence easterly along section lines to the southeast corner of section 25, township 4 south, range 24 east;

Thence northerly along section lines to the northeast corner of what will probably be when surveyed section 13;

Thence easterly along section lines to the southeast corner of section 12, township 4 south, range 25 east, Salt Lake meridian, on the Utah-Colorado boundary line;

Thence southerly along the Utah-Colorado boundary line to the southwest corner of section 11, township 6 north, range 104 west, sixth principal meridian;

Thence easterly along section lines to the southeast corner of section 10, township 6 north, range 103 west;

Thence southerly along section lines to the southwest corner of section 23;

Thence easterly along section lines to the southeast corner of section 24;

Thence southerly along the section line to the southwest corner of section 30, township 6 north, range 102 west;

Thence easterly along section lines to the southeast corner of section 25, township 6 north, range 101 west;

Thence southerly along the section line to the southwest corner of section 30, township 6 north, range 100 west;

Thence easterly along section lines to the southeast corner of section 29;

Thence southerly along the section line to the southwest corner of section 33;

Thence easterly along section lines to the southeast corner of the west half of section 32, township 6 north, range 99 west;

Thence northerly along the east lines of the west halves of sections 32, 29, 20, 17, 8, and 5 to the northeast corner of the west half of section 5;

Thence westerly along section lines to the northwest corner of section 6 township 6 north, range 101 west;

Thence northerly along section lines to the northeast corner of section 25, township 7 north, ranges 101 west;

Thence westerly along section lines to the northwest corner of what will probably be when surveyed section 28, township 7 north, range 102 west;

Thence northerly along section lines to the northeast corner of section 5;

Thence easterly along section lines to the southeast corner of section 34, township 8 north, range 102 west;

Thence northerly along section lines to the northeast corner of section 27;

Thence westerly along section lines to the northwest corner of section 28;

Thence northerly along section lines to the northeast corner of what will probably be when surveyed section 5;

Thence easterly along the section line to the southeast corner of section 33, township 9 north, range 102 west;

SEC. 3. (a) To provide suitable access to Dinosaur National Park the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to select the location of an entrance road or roads to the park and to points of interest in the park, and to acquire lands or interests in lands for such roads by donation only: Provided, The land so acquired shall consist of the fee title to a right-of-way of not more than 100 feet and such scenic easements over adjoining land as the Secretary finds are necessary to assure a parklike character to the roads.

(b) Upon acceptance of title to such lands, or interests therein, the Secretary is authorized to construct, reconstruct, improve, and maintain upon the land so acquired or otherwise in government ownership an entrance road or roads of parkway standards, including necessary bridges, and funds appropriated for the National Park Service shall be available for these purposes.

(c) The Secretary is authorized further to promulgate and enforce such rules and regulations for the administration of the said entrance road or roads as in his discretion may be necessary, or he may, by appropriate order or orders, revise the boundaries of Dinosaur National Park to include the parkway lands, such order or orders to be effective upon publication in the Federal Register.

SEC. 4. Where any Federal lands included within Dinosaur National Park by this Act were legally occupied or utilized on the date of approval of this Act for grazing purposes pursuant to a lease, permit, or license issued or authorized by any department, establishment or agency of the United States, the person so occupying or utilizing such lands, and the heirs, successors, or assigns of such person, shall upon the termination of such lease, permit, or license be entitled to have the privilege so possessed or enjoyed by him renewed from time or time, subject to such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe, for a period of 25 years from the date of approval of this Act, and thereafter during the lifetime of such person and the lifetime of his heirs, successors, or assigns, but only if they were members of his immediate family on such date, as determined by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That grazing privileges appurtenant to privately owned lands located within Dinosaur National Park established by this Act shall not be withdrawn until title to the lands to which such privileges are appurtenant shall have vested in the United States, except for failure to comply with the regulations applicable thereto after reasonable notice of default. Nothing contained in this Act shall be construed as creating any vested right, title, interest, or estate in or to any Federal lands.

SEC. 5. The Presidential proclamations of October 4, 1915, and July 14, 1938, establishing and enlarging the Dinosaur National Monument are hereby superseded and any remaining unexpended balances of funds appropriated for the Dinosaur National Monument shall hereafter be available for expenditure in connection with the administration of the Dinosaur National Park.

RULES OF INTERPRETATION GOVERNING QUESTIONS OF EFFECT OF ACTS OF CONGRESS ON STATE LAWS—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Under authority of the order of the Senate of January 9, 1959, the name of Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina was added as an additional cosponsor of the bill (S. 3) to establish rules of interpretation governing questions of the effect of acts of Congress on State laws, introduced by Mr. MCCLELLAN (for himself and other Senators) on January 9, 1959.

AMENDMENT OF REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 2 OF 1953—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Under the authority of the order of the Senate of January 9, 1959, the names of Senators HENNINGS, MAGNUSON, YARBOROUGH, JOHNSTON of South Carolina, HILL, LANGER, MURRAY, HARTKE, JACKSON, KERR, PROXMIRE, MORSE, KEFAUVER, CARROLL, O'MAHONEY, THURMOND, JORDAN, KENNEDY, FULBRIGHT, YOUNG of North Dakota, and SPARKMAN were added as additional cosponsors of the bill (S. 144) to amend the Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953, introduced by Mr. HUMPHREY (for himself and Mr. MANSFIELD) on January 9, 1959.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. HUMPHREY:

Address delivered by Senator JOHNSON of Texas, at meeting of Democrats on January 7, 1959.

By Mr. DIRKSEN:

An address delivered by him at Freeport, Ill., on October 17, 1958, and one at Galesburg., Ill., on October 17, 1958, as a part of the anniversary series in commemoration of the Lincoln-Douglas debates in 1958.

By Mr. KEFAUVER:

Statement prepared by him relating to the Big Brother Week movement.

VICE PRESIDENT NIXON ON THE MISSILE RACE

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, an article in the press this morning states that Vice President NIXON contends the United States is now ahead of the Soviets in ballistic missiles. If Mr. NIXON made that statement, it is not correct, and I do not know a single impartial expert in the missile field who would support it.

There seems to be a continuing effort on the part of high officials in this administration to lull the people into a state of complacency not justified by the facts.

I therefore call on the Vice President to give the people, in percentages, the number of operational ICBM's this Nation will have at the end of this year as compared with the number our intelligence estimates the Soviets will have.

As further illustration of how far we are falling back, I now also call on the Vice President to tell the American people what percentage of intercontinental ballistic missiles it is planned for this Nation to have operational as of, say, January 1961, 2 years hence, as against the ICBM stockpile our intelligence estimates the Russians will have by that date.

The Vice President does not need to publish the actual figures, only the percentages.

There is now little if any time left.

Surely the people have the right to know the truth.

Therefore, if the Vice President does not release these percentages by the end of this week, I shall release them myself.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CARLSON in the chair). The Senator from Missouri has the floor.

THWARTING THE WILL OF CONGRESS ON DEFENSE

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, last year, after listening to the military experts, Congress appropriated $1,321,000,000 more for national defense than the amount requested by the President.

The able senior Senator from New Mexico has now brought to light what has happened to that additional $1.3 billion—and this is the story.

No more important new weapon is scheduled to come up than the Minuteman—the ICBM which will follow the Atlas and the Titan.

The Congress appropriated $90 million additional to expedite work on the Minuteman.

Not 1 cent of that money has been used, or is scheduled to be used during the present fiscal year.

The Hound Dog missile is an air-to-ground unit, designed to extend the range, and thereby increase the effectiveness, of long-range bombers. Its importance cannot be overemphasized.

Accordingly, the Congress appropriated $48 million additional for that missile.

Not 1 cent of this money has been used, or is scheduled to be used during the present fiscal year.

So that our strategic bombing force can be more truly intercontinental in range, the Congress appropriated $55 million for additional production of KC–135 tankers. The Strategic Air Force said last month that the production of these tankers represented their greatest shortage.

Not 1 cent of this money has been used or is scheduled to be used during the present fiscal year.

Our Army lacks mobility. The Chief of Staff recently spoke out emphatically for more airlift to correct that condition.

In effort to partially correct this condition, Congress appropriated $140 million for the production of modern strategic airlift aircraft.

Not one cent of this $140 million has been used, or is scheduled to be used in the present fiscal year.

The new atomic submarines, equipped with Polaris missiles, would appear to be one of the most effective methods of retaliation against any sudden surprise nuclear attack.

With that in mind, the Congress appropriated $609 million more to expand this Polaris-submarine program, from five such weapons systems to nine.

A few weeks ago the administration did allocate some of this money for one additional submarine. There is no plan to use the rest of this money during the present fiscal year.

Once again, money appropriated by the Congress for the personnel strength of the Marine Corps was either frozen, or used for other purposes not specified by the Congress.

This year the same action was true about additional money appropriated for the personnel of the Army.

In summary, out of the total of $1.3 billion appropriated by the Congress for additional security, only 34 percent has been allocated for use in the fiscal year 1959 for the purposes for which it was appropriated.

Another 8 percent of this total is being used for purposes for which it was not appropriated.

The remaining 58 percent has been frozen; and the Department of Defense states it does not plan to use the money during this fiscal year.

There have been previous cases where the administration has thwarted efforts of the Congress to give this Nation an adequate defense; but none as clear, or as large in scope, as the above action this year.

THE EQUALITY OF OPPORTUNITY BILL

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, there lies on the desk, with many cosponsors, a bill which should commend itself to the cosponsorship of an increasing number of Senators. The trend toward bigness in American business units is causing inquiry and concern.

Many of the little fellows who are the backbone of America are being squeezed out.

Often this is done by the kind of price competition which leads to a monopoly or tends to reduce competition.

This continues to be legal because of a Supreme Court decision in the so-called Standard Oil case—(Standard Oil Co. v. Federal Trade Commission ((1951) 340 U.S. 231.) In order to plug a loophole found by the Supreme Court in the existing antiprice discrimination statute, S. 11 is introduced again. Many may differ as to the language which should be used to safeguard the competitive rights of small business, but I think none will deny that small business must be preserved for the benefit of all America.

I therefore invite attention to the opportunity of cosponsoring this bill so that it can have a fair hearing.

In order that our colleagues may inform themselves as to the specific language of this bill, and because it has not yet been printed, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed as part of my remarks, together with my explanation of its effect.

There being no objection, the bill and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 11

A bill to amend the Robinson-Patman Act with reference to equality of opportunity

DECLARATION OF PURPOSE AND POLICY

To reaffirm the national public policy and the purpose of Congress in the laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, commonly designated "antitrust" laws, which among other things prohibit price discrimination; to aid in intelligent, fair, and effective administration and enforcement thereof; and to strengthen the Robinson-Patman Anti-Price Discrimination Act and the protection which it affords to independent business, the Congress hereby reaffirms that the purpose of the antitrust laws in prohibiting price discriminations is to secure equality of opportunity to all persons to compete in trade or business and to preserve competition where it exists, to restore it where it is destroyed, and to permit it to spring up in new fields.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That subsection (b) of section 2 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1944, as amended (15 U.S.C. 13(b)), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. (b) Upon proof being made, at any hearing on a complaint under this section, that there has been discrimination in price or services or facilities furnished, the burden of rebutting the prima facie case thus made by showing justification shall be upon the person charged with a violation of this section, and unless justification shall be affirmatively shown, the Commission is authorized to issue an order terminating the discrimination: Provided, however, That unless the evidence affirmatively shows that the effect of the discrimination may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce, in any section of the country, it shall be a complete defense for a seller to show that his lower price or the furnishing of services or facilities to any purchaser or purchasers was made in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor, or the services or facilities furnished by a competitor: Provided further, That nothing contained herein shall be construed to alter the law applicable to the absorption of freight or of shipping charges."

EQUALITY OF OPPORTUNITY FOR SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, as I have said on many occasions, among others during an address I delivered before the Retail Gasoline Dealers at their convention at Wausau, Wis., on June 25, 1956, I am heartily in favor of S. 11 to amend the Robinson-Patman Act so as to give greater equality of opportunity to small business.

S. 11, as H. R. 1840, was passed by the House by a vote, as I recall it, of 393 to 3. Hearings had been held in the House, but the Senate Antitrust Subcommittee also conducted comprehensive hearings. It is the American way to give all sides a fair opportunity to present their arguments. I believe all had a full and fair opportunity to be heard. Their testimony was fully considered.

The evidence confirmed me in my belief that the equality of opportunity provisions are sound and are needed to save small business.

What the bill would do to help the difficult situation in which small business finds itself is, to put it simply, this:

First. The Robinson-Patman Act was passed to outlaw price discrimination.

Second. We are accustomed to a one-price system when we go into a department store or a grocery store to buy at retail. The store does not offer me one price and my neighbor a different price. The act intended that big corporations in dealing with their wholesalers and retailers should act in a similar way, having in mind differences in costs and transportation rates and service rendered in return by the buyer.

Third. In 1951, the United States Supreme Court in the so-called Detroit Standard case—Standard Oil Co. v. Federal Trade Commission ((1951) 340 U.S. 231)—decided, in a prosecution for price discrimination, that it was a complete and final defense to prove that defendant had lowered his price to meet the legal price of a competitor, and had done so in good faith. The Supreme Court decided that this was an absolute and final defense, although it had been thought by the Government, on the basis of the legislative history, and the statutory language of the act, that such proof merely shifted back to the Government the burden of going ahead, and the burden of final proof that the defendant's action had also tended substantially to lessen competition. The Court's decision blocked the Government from going ahead to prove that defendant had hurt the competitive system.

Fourth. Up to that time, the Robinson-Patman Act had been pretty effective and the small people had not found it too difficult to do business. Since that decision, more and more small retailers have found themselves in serious trouble as a result of price discrimination by large interstate concerns who are moving into the territory of the small concerns. The pattern of this big-business attack often seems to be that the big concern takes advantage of a lowered price to make a similar price cut, and then extends it broadly so that there is such a price war that the small-business store is badly hurt or driven out of existence. Of course, if the Government could prove that these price wars were started through collusion, the law in its present state, even with the Supreme Court decisions, would permit prosecution. However, such collusion is very hard to prove in a court case.

Fifth. Under these circumstances, the proposed bill, which has been supported by hundreds of small people in Wisconsin and throughout the country, in both telegrams and letters to me, I believe, would restore the status quo ante, as it existed prior to the Supreme Court case. Now, meeting a competitor's price is a complete defense. However, this bill would permit the Government to go ahead and try to prove, if it could, that meeting the competitor's price had set off such a substantial price war as to injure or destroy enough competitive business to satisfy a court that the defendant's action had substantially lessened competition. This is a needed protection for the small fellow. We certainly do not want America to be just a series of assembly lines, with workmen sitting alongside doing routine tasks as the line of machinery or goods passes by. I hope that I shall never see this happen. And I believe this bill will help to delay, if not prevent, any such result. The independent is essential to the strength of the American way of life.

Sixth. It has been made clear, I believe, in the course of the subcommittee hearing, that S. 11 would not outlaw absorption of freight costs unless it was part of a discriminatory pricing practice, which would be illegal anyway. We have added a rider to make this clear. I believe it has also been made clear that a small man meeting a price of his next-door neighbor would not be substantially lessening competition, even though he might take business away from his immediate competitor. As in so many antitrust cases, the question of how many people have to be hurt before a violation occurs, is a question of degree, which it is impossible to specify by statute in advance. American pricing policies and American competitive practices are, by the very nature of our way of life, fluid and complex. Any rigid, overly specific statute dealing with them would freeze their flexibility unwisely. The best antitrust law is fluid and adaptable to a myriad of complex and differing situations.

I believe this bill meets these standards and helps our American way of life, and I hope we shall all promptly consider it on the floor and help to get it passed.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE EBERHARTER, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I should like to associate myself with the remarks made by my friend, the distinguished senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], on Friday last in connection with Senate Resolution 13, referring to the passing of the Honorable HERMAN P. EBERHARTER, a distinguished Member of the other body.

Mr. EBERHARTER was known by all Members of the various Congresses in which he served. His courage was greatly admired. During a crippling illness, he came to the floor and served with his committee while suffering severe pain and at a considerable sacrifice to his already seriously impaired health. Members of this body and the other body regret that he will not be with us this session. We mourn his passing. We have lost a very dear friend.

DEATH OF FORMER SENATOR DAVIS ELKINS

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, last week the distinguished minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN], with whom I have the remembered privilege of serving in the House, appropriately addressed this membership on the passing of the late U.S. Senator from West Virginia, Davis Elkins. I was not in the Chamber when those remarks were made. Today I desire to join in an expression of appreciation for the public service of the late Senator Davis Elkins.

I knew Senator Elkins personally, having first met him in 1926. I enjoyed his friendship. We were associated for several years, when I was a member of the faculty of Davis and Elkins College, an institution founded by Senators Henry Gassaway Davis and Stephen B. Elkins, the latter having been the father of the late Senator Davis Elkins.

During those years on the campus I was cognizant of the interest of Senator Davis Elkins in the work of that educational institution. Subsequently, we served together on its governing board. He supported the college in many constructive ways. It is also appropriate to mention that we in West Virginia revere the memory, not only of Senator Stephen B. Elkins, the father of Senator Davis Elkins, but also of Hallie Elkins, the mother of Senator Davis Elkins.

It is interesting—and I believe it is significant—to relate that Hallie Elkins was the daughter of a U.S. Senator, the wife of a U.S. Senator, and the mother of a U.S. Senator—an unusual distinction. She was the daughter of the late U.S. Senator Henry Gassaway Davis, one time a Democratic vice presidential candidate. She became the wife of U.S. Senator Stephen B. Elkins, who also served in the Cabinet of the United States. Her son, to whom I have made reference today, the late Senator Davis Elkins, was also a Member of this body.

I share in the sentiments expressed by the illustrious minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN]. Associated with me in this memorial to the late Senator Davis Elkins are the Members of the West Virginia congressional delegation, including my colleague, the able junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD], and the Members of the House delegation. To the surviving widow and three children we express our sincere sympathy.

THE AMERICAN AIRLINES STRIKE

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, along with all of my colleagues, I was happy to learn last Friday that the strike, which the Airlines Pilots Association had called against American Airlines on December 19, was settled. I join the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] in congratulating the parties concerned for reaching an agreement. However, Congress cannot shirk its responsibility in this field simply because the strike is settled.

For a number of days during the busy holiday season, both Eastern and American Airlines were completely grounded because of strikes. Both of these major airlines serve the State of Kentucky. When both of these lines were on strike, the passenger seats available at Standiford Field in Louisville, Ky., were reduced by approximately 83 percent. Such a situation not only causes a serious inconvenience to the traveling public, but it adversely affects the national economy as well.

Before the American Airlines strike begins to fade away as an unpleasant memory, I should like to review certain salient points which I think we should bear in mind.

First. Service to 23 States, the District of Columbia, Canada, and Mexico was disrupted by the strike.

Second. Twenty-two thousand passengers each day were without service on American Airlines because of the strike.

Third. Twenty thousand of the employees of American Airlines went off the payroll on January 5 because of this strike. American continued to pay its employees, other than pilots, during the 2 weeks of the Christmas and New Year season.

Fourth. American Airlines had been negotiating with the Pilots' Association, without success, for 16 months.

Fifth. The principal issues in the controversy were, first, shorter hours: The average workweek was 21¼ hours, but the pilots wanted shorter hours; second, more money; and third, rules, which have the effect of paying for work not done.

Sixth. The National Mediation Board, December 22, 1958, recommended to each of the parties a basis of settlement which the Board believed to be equitable.

The company accepted this recommendation by the Board, December 23, 1958. The Pilots' Association had given the Board no answer during the 2 weeks which followed, other than to say that it was considering the recommendation. In the meantime, the Pilots' Association continued to bring up new issues.

Seventh. The pilots refused the pay plan which the company offered, saying they must have more money. Prior to the strike, the estimated annual income for 85 hours of flying per month for senior pilots was as follows: For a Convair plane, $15,000; for a Douglas DC–6, $17,000; and for a Douglas DC–7, $19,000.

The company offered $17,500 for the Convair, $20,000 for the DC–6, and $22,500 for the DC–7. The company also offered to pay the senior pilots $23,500 in the case of the operation of the Lockheed Electra and $28,000 for the operation of the Boeing 707. Both of these models are scheduled to go into service this month, I regard this company offer as quite substantial in view of the fact that many of these pilots are able to arrange their 85-hour work month so that they can operate a small business of their own, run a ranch or farm, or pursue some remunerative trade or other line of endeavor.

The airlines today play a vital role in the economic welfare of the Nation. I agree with the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS], who classed the airlines as a "quasi-public utility." I hope the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce will proceed to study this problem and recommend legislation to deal with it. No one wants to deny to the employees of our airlines the benefits of free collective bargaining. In order fully to achieve these benefits the employees must ultimately have the right to strike. However, we can certainly provide machinery, as we have done in the case of the railroads, so that the strike will indeed be a last resort. My study of the American Airlines case leads me to the conclusion that an equitable settlement could have been reached without discontinuing this vital service.

AN APPRAISAL OF THE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, the vicissitudes of the American-flag merchant navy continue to be a matter of great concern to me. The Honorable Clarence G. Morse, Chairman, Federal Maritime Board, and Maritime Administrator, submitted a number of observations to the 13th convention of the National Defense Transportation Association in St. Louis, Mo., on November 12 last, and I attach such significance to Mr. Morse's speech that unanimous consent is requested to have it printed in the body of the RECORD at this point so that my colleagues may give consideration to his comments.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS BY CLARENCE G. MORSE, CHAIRMAN, FEDERAL MARITIME BOARD, MARITIME ADMINISTRATOR, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE, AT THE NATIONAL DEFENSE TRANSPORTATION ASSOCIATION CONVENTION IN ST. LOUIS, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1958, AT THE USERS AND GOVERNMENT PANEL ON THE QUESTION OF "IS TRANSPORTATION IN BATTLE ARRAY"

Reporting for the American merchant marine, I feel that we can best go on record on the question of whether we are prepared to assume the responsibilities of defense or war emergency by saying that we are doing our level best under difficult and trying circumstances.

The major project for the American merchant marine continues to be the replacement of its older ships and on the success of this program depends our ability to have "in being" the number and types of ships necessary to meet our share of the Nation's mobilization and defense planning.

Last year at the National Defense Transportation Association parley in the Nation's Capital, I reported that for mobilization purposes we had need of all the ships presently under U.S. flag. That in respect to number of ships, we are in reasonably good shape but that in quality, we were deficient. That thumbnail report is applicable today. Since my last report we have made progress. The American merchant marine has acquired the new steamships Santa Rose, Santa Paula, and the new steamship Brasil in the cargo-passenger field and, before the end of the year, will acquire the new steamship Argentina. We are building some 16 new freighters of approximately 175,000 deadweight tons and 58 large tankers.

For our 450 American-flag foreign berth service ships the outlook is fairly bright. Three hundred and nine ships of this group are under subsidy contract and we have every reason to hope we can keep the replacement of these vessels on schedule and to continue to improve this segment of the American merchant marine in speed, carrying capacity, and ability to meet the specialized needs of the routes they serve. The approximately 150 ships not covered by subsidy contract are generally covered in pending subsidy applications and their replacement and suitability will be under Government survey in the event they are found to qualify for a Government contract under the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, as amended. Therefore in this liner category we are in reasonably good position.

The outlook for American tramp ship replacement has not improved. Slippage in earning capacity in this area has made even more difficult the problem of replacement of tramp tonnage. In this area there are some 123 privately owned Libertys, about 70 of which are now actively engaged in nonliner trade.

Now let us turn to the tanker segment of our fleet. Last year I was able to report to you that there was a reasonably good outlook for this privately owned 328-ship vital segment of the American Merchant Marine.

As of November 1, 1957, we were keeping approximately 300 of our tankers active and fully employed and had contracts for some 80 new tankers in pretty firm shape.

Now as of November 1, 1958, our active tanker fleet has dropped by 25 units to 275 vessels actively employed and there has been curtailment of tanker building plans, some being canceled and some of these we thought pretty firm taking on an air of definite uncertainty. Contracts in yards for tanker construction over the past year have dropped from about 80 to 50, a considerable percentage curtailment, the balance being accounted for largely by deliveries.

In all fairness, the tanker picture has been a complicated one. Tanker outlook was thrown out of focus by the closing of the Suez Canal and the resulting dislocations unduly stimulated tanker building. Another factor affecting world tanker operations and building is the United States policy of voluntary oil import curtailment. Our national policy of voluntary oil import curtailment is designed primarily to strengthen national security. It also is a factor affecting decisions in respect to world tanker operations and building for the present.

The most recent estimates of mobilization requirements for tankers by the Department of Defense, under current strategic concepts, continue to indicate a substantial deficit. In other words, the present available tanker tonnage is insufficient to meet our mobilization needs. Moreover, the fact that over 80 percent of the present U.S. tanker fleet will be overage within 5 to 8 years is a matter of serious concern. Emphasis is thus placed on the fact that a tanker building program, phased over the next 10 years, is essential to overcome our existing defense deficiencies.

If this new building is to be done for private account, as distinguished from Government building, with the taxpayer bearing the full brunt of the costs, a reasonable prospect for the employment of our tanker tonnage must exist.

Under the trade-out-and-build program, the Maritime Administration has approved transfers, with U.S. ownership, of older tankers in consideration of construction of new tanker tonnage in American yards for American-flag operation. Also, under the provisions of title XI of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, as amended, mortgage insurance aid is available to U.S. citizens for the construction of tankers. These programs, from their inception, have stimulated the replacement and upgrading of tankers for U.S.-flag operation and have increased the number of such vessels under U.S. control.

It is clear to us at Maritime, that unless employment can be found for tankers a serious condition will exist which may frustrate our national defense planning for an adequate tanker fleet, may materially weaken the attitude of preparedness and defense that we are able to assume on the high seas, and may have an adverse impact on our title XI insured mortgages on tankers.

There is a bright spot in our defense readiness, gentlemen, that I should like to report on at this time, and that is in the area of troop-lift capacity.

The 85th Congress has authorized legislation for the construction of two new superliners, and it is our intention at the Maritime Administration to program for these two new vessels by seeking funds for their construction in fiscal 1960. If approved across the board, this program will bring to the American Merchant Marine two new splendid passenger lines—one, a sister ship to the steamship United States as a replacement for the aged America and the other a new superliner for Pacific travel. The thing I wish to point out here is that these Atlantic and Pacific superliners together will add a combined total of 9,500 emergency spaces to our instantly available troop lift. By rapid conversion, this capacity is capable of being increased to 14,000-plus troop spaces for the Atlantic superliner and 10,000-plus for the Pacific ship.

This means that these two ships will increase our instantly available troop-lift capacity by 30 percent before conversion and by a healthy 50 percent after conversion.

Now, gentlemen, for your consideration, I should like to make this point. Since these two ships will be built as commercial passenger-carrying vessels, with 45 percent of their cost of construction borne by private American shipping lines, who will operate them in peacetime, these ships save the American taxpayer money on defense.

For example, general Navy transports of the P–2 class carrying 4,000 troops each at a speed of 20 knots. The proposed sister ship of the steamship United States in the Atlantic would have a factor of 5.4 in comparison with the P–2 transports. This means that because one ship like the steamship United States can travel almost twice as fast as a P–2 and, when converted, carry more than three times as many troops, it is worth 5.4 times the $21 million it would cost the Navy to build a P–2 transport.

In other words it would cost the Navy a reported $113 million to build a P–2 troop-lift capability comparable in size, but still inferior in quality to that of this new Atlantic liner. But, because 45 percent of the cost of the Atlantic superliner will be borne by the shipping line, the Government will obtain this improved troop-lift capacity for approximately $83 million.

In addition to this 45-percent discount in the cost of troop-lift spaces, the Government will be spared the expense of peacetime crews and the cost of peacetime operation and maintenance of this stockpile of defense potential.

The Pacific superliner will mean comparable savings. Here the factor to a P–2 troop carrier will be 4.75 or in other words, to obtain a troop carrier capability equal to that of the Pacific ship the Navy would have to construct a reported $99 million worth of P–2's. The Pacific auxiliary will cost the Government $42 million, thus representing a savings to the taxpayer of $57 million in construction, to say nothing of what the Government will save by not having to man, operate, and maintain those P–2's.

Thus in these new ships the Government will not only get bargain-priced troop carriers available at the instant they are needed, but it will be getting faster ships and safer ships.

Thus, we are, gentlemen, working hard, within the framework of the maritime laws and statutes to provide, at the lowest possible cost to the Government, a merchant marine to serve our trade and commerce and ready to turn to the national defense in time of war or emergency.

Our weak spots are tramp replacement and a lack of bulk carriers in the ore transportation field. We are carefully watching our tanker potential and we are pushing the modernization of our liner vessels. All of our tasks are complicated and require continuous diligence and devotion.

These elements I feel are being applied in fullest measure.

AMENDMENT OF RULES

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, we have been treated over the weekend to a spate of articles appearing in the press about how the liberals, as we are told on the floor, have been outmaneuvered, have been badgered, have been generally defeated in the measure which is before the Senate which seeks to adopt some effective way to deal with filibusters. I number myself proudly among those who are engaged in this struggle, which I think is a historic struggle in our country.

I point out one thing which I think is extremely important to the Members of the Senate and to the country; that is, aside from all the badgering, and parliamentary maneuvering, the fact is that we have had a majority, in the two votes which have been cast—a decisive majority in this body—who have expressed their will on certain fundamental proposals, the latter of the proposals relating to the fundamental question which is also before us, namely, the continuing of the rules of the Senate, and who are concerned essentially for the right of a majority to express its will.

So I do not see how we can feel that we are being outmaneuvered or put upon if the majority is given an opportunity to express its will, as it has been up to now, and as it will be today.

The important thing is that with the right to vote goes also the responsibility. In the morning hour, while we are talking about general things, and about what has appeared in the press, I express the hope that Senators who are voting and will be voting today on even more critical matters with respect to rule XXII than they have been up to now—these will be the decisive votes for the country today—will understand that when they do vote, they will be making a record for which they will have to answer in the days ahead—in 1960, 1962, and 1964—because I am deeply convinced that what is at stake is not simply rule XXII and filibusters; what is at stake is the whole climate of legislation in Congress.

To me it is a real anachronism that in one and the same issue of the press yesterday there was published a report by a committee of the other body on the space age; but the Senate was fighting to perpetuate rules which relate to the horse and buggy age.

This is a fundamental issue, as I see it. But the point I wish to emphasize in the morning hour is that certainly a majority of the Senate can and will express its will. That is exactly what we are contending for. We are contending for some kind of enlightenment on the question of the filibuster. But let also those who vote in that group, as we go along in our voting, understand the issue, which is far greater than the mere question of how long we can talk on a particular issue, and also understand that this is a matter of historic responsibility, to which I and every other Senator can and should be held to account.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, if morning business is concluded, I yield to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], such time as he may desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 5) proposing to amend Senate rules XXII and XXXII.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], for himself and other Senators, providing for a majority vote on cloture after 15 days of debate.

The Senator from Alabama is recognized for such time as he may desire.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I am opposed to any change in the rules of the Senate which would deny free debate. The Senate for over a hundred years, from 1806 to 1917, had complete freedom of debate. I think history will record that the cloture rule which was adopted in 1917 would not have been adopted but for the fact that at that time we had not adopted the 20th amendment, the so-called lame duck amendment to the Constitution, which was ratified on January 23, 1933, and which ended the short sessions of Congress that under the Constitution had to come to an end on March 4.

We recall that Benjamin Franklin—and there was no wiser man than Franklin, who was a member of the Constitutional Convention and, as we recall, played an important part in writing the Constitution—spoke of the Senate as the saucer. It was a saucer into which the hot coffee was to be poured to give it time and opportunity to cool. The House of Representatives, if at any time it took any precipitate action, if it acted with too much speed and didn't thoroughly consider and thresh out the full significance and effect of that action, had always this saucer waiting for the measure to cool.

We recall that Mr. Gladstone, in speaking of the Senate, said:

That remarkable body, the most remarkable of all the inventions of modern politics.

What is it that makes the Senate remarkable? Nothing more nor less than the free debate in the Senate. Take from the Senate this right of free debate, invoke cloture in the Senate, and then your Senate is no more than any other legislative body that we might consider. It is remarkable, as Mr. Gladstone said, only because of this free debate.

The thing that I wish to emphasize with all the emphasis that I can bring to bear is that if you deny free debate in the Senate of the United States you have changed the character of the Senate of the United States. You cannot change the character of the Senate of the United States without changing the Government of the United States.

In considering proposals for denying free debate in the Senate we are not considering some simple matter of procedure in the Senate, some simple change of its rules. We are considering a proposed change in the Senate that would mean a fundamental and basic change in the Government of the United States as we have known that Government from the beginning down to the present.

That is the question before us. Are we going to change our Government—this constitutional Republic that we have had all these years and under which we have grown to be the mightiest Nation that the sun has ever shone upon, and under which our people have enjoyed the greatest freedom ever known to mankind?

Mr. President, the right of a Senator to get on the floor, to present all the facts in connection with an issue, to turn the light of truth and justice and fairness on that issue, goes to the very heart of the freedoms of the people of these United States and to the protection not only of the freedoms of the people and of the individual citizens but to the protection of the rights of the several States, to the protection of the rights of minorities of every kind.

It is suggested here that this freedom of debate be cut off, be denied by simply a majority vote in the Senate.

As Senators will recall, the Founding Fathers—men like James Madison, Gouverneur Morris, and George Washington—had a great fear when they brought this Government into being. That fear was the danger of what they termed party spirit.

As George Washington expressed it in his Farewell Address, "the baneful effects of party spirit."

Let me call to the attention of Senators an excerpt from his words. Now, weigh this, weigh it well, because, in my opinion, the thing that has averted this danger, the thing that has averted the baneful effects of party spirit that Washington feared, was the very free debate in the Senate of the United States. George Washington in his Farewell Address said to us:

> I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the State with particular reference to the founding of them on geographical discrimination. Let me now take a more comprehensive view and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.
> This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed, but in those of the popular forum it is seen in its greatest rankness and is truly their worst enemy. Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind, which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight, the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

I served in the House of Representatives for a good many years, as did our present distinguished Presiding Officer, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON], and I am sure he shares my pride in the greatness of that body. I served in the House of Representatives for a good many years, and there I saw party government. Great as is the House of Representatives, and I am indeed proud of having once been one of its Members—there is no free debate in the House of Representatives. There cannot be any. The membership is too large.

We see in the House of Representatives the very thing about which Washington warned. What has saved us has been the free debate in the Senate of the United States.

We have had a good deal of discussion here about action by a majority. There are Members of the Senate today who served here when the majority party, which happened to be the Democratic Party, had 76 of the 96 votes. The Republican Party had only 16 votes. The other four votes were among the Progressives and the Farmer-Labor Party. Today, as we know, the Senate is composed of 64 Democrats and 34 Republicans.

The important thing is that parties do control this body so far as numbers are concerned, and we must have restraint on party spirit so that we may not suffer from the baneful effects of which Washington warned us.

Remember, Senators, we never know what the future may bring. Nobody knows what will be the story in the years ahead, and I say to the Senate that some of those who now press hardest, some of those who insist most determinedly for change in the Senate rules and denial of free debate, may be the very ones who tomorrow will find that free debate is needed for the protection of their rights.

We fought World War I, which, up to that time, was the greatest war in the history of the world, with free debate in the Senate. Then we fought World War II. Nothing in the history of the world has been comparable to our deeds and accomplishments in that war. We fought the war against the most terrible depression, the depression of the early thirties. We did not have to invoke cloture to win these wars. We won them with free debate in the Senate. We know the conscientiousness, the sense of responsibility, the devotion to duty that always triumphs among the membership of the Senate of the United States. Our country is not great because of laws and prohibitions. Our country is great because of the character of those who represent our people in their Government.

As "The Federalist," No. 51, tells us:

> A dependence on the people is, no doubt, the primary control on the government, but experience has taught mankind the necessity of auxiliary precautions.

The framers of the Constitution sought to have "in the society so many separate descriptions of citizens as will render an unjust combination of the majority of the whole very improbable, if not impracticable."

Has anyone been able to suggest a single important or beneficent measure which has been killed because we have had free debate in the Senate of the United States?

Since the Senate has had the present rule, cloture petitions have been filed, as I recall, some 20 times, and only 4 times did the Senate see fit to invoke cloture. What reason have we today, what arguments have been presented which would justify us in changing the character of the Senate, in changing the American constitutional republic as we have known it?

I have heard of no bill, no measure, which has gone down to defeat that should have been passed. Free debate has brought about some delays, that is true, and I would be the last to deny that there have been some abuses. But, so long as human nature is human nature and is not perfect, there will be abuses. However, regardless of the question of abuses, the benefits from free debate far outweigh the abuses which may have occurred under it.

The most famous measure which has ever been defeated by free debate was the Force bill of 1890, a bill somewhat in the same category with so-called civil rights bills.

Surely every Senator of the United States should know that there has never been a debate on these bills but that Senators who are far removed from any sectional thought or interest—Senators who considered the measures only on the basis of their constitutionality and what they might mean to the impairment of our institutions and the welfare of the whole country—have with great emphasis proclaimed their unconstitutionality.

One of the greatest constitutional speeches ever made in the Senate of the United States was the speech made by the late Senator from Idaho, William E. Borah, on the unconstitutionality of the antilynching bill. No one could accuse Senator Borah of having any sectional prejudices or any personal interest in the matter. He simply weighed the bill in the scales of constitutionality, and he was so shocked by its unconstitutionality, its contravention of the spirit of the letter of the Constitution, that he was moved to make his great and powerful speech on the floor of the Senate showing the unconstitutionality of the bill.

One of the greatest speeches made on the floor of the Senate was the speech of the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] on the unconstitutionality of the anti-poll-tax bill.

As I have said, the most famous bill ever defeated by the free debate was the Force bill introduced in the House of Representatives and valiantly fought for by the late Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, Sr., of Massachusetts. He fought for the bill in the House of Representatives. He came over to the Senate. He was at the time very much opposed to free and unlimited debate; he favored cloture.

After he had served in the Senate a while, after he had had the experience of such service, after he had grown in wisdom and knowledge and experience—and as we know he was one of the most erudite men ever to sit in the Senate of the United States, a great student not only of our own Government but of all of the governments of the world—he gave to us and to our country the benefit of his ripened and seasoned and mature judgment.

I desire to take a minute to read a few excerpts from what Senator Lodge said. Senator Lodge said:

> It is not necessary to trace the long struggle between these opposing forces which ended in the most famous compromise of the Constitution of which the Senate was the vital element and which finally enabled the Convention to bring its work to a successful conclusion. It is sufficient here to point out that, as the Constitution was necessarily made by the States alone, they yielded with the utmost reluctance to the grants of power to the people of the United States as a whole and sought in every way to protect the rights of the several States against invasion by the national authority. The States, it must be remembered, as they then stood, were all sovereign States. Each one possessed all the rights and attributes of sovereignty, and the Constitution could only be made by surrendering to the General Government a portion of these sovereign powers. In the Senate, accordingly, the States endeavored to secure every possible power which would protect them and their rights. They ordained that each State should have two Senators without reference to population, thus securing equality of representation among the States. They then provided in article V of the Constitution that "No State without its consent should be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

What I am pleading for today is that the State of Iowa or Mississippi or Arizona or California or any other State shall not be denied its right to be heard in the United States Senate.

Then Senator Lodge went on:

> Except on some rare occasions, the Senate has been the conservative part of the legislative branch of the Government. The cloture and other drastic rules for preventing delay and compelling action which it has been found necessary to adopt and apply in the House of Representatives have never, except in a most restricted form, been admitted in the Senate. Debate in the Senate has remained practically unlimited, and despite the impatience which unrestricted debate often creates, there can be no doubt that in the long run it has been most important and indeed very essential to free and democratic government to have one body where every great question could be fully and deliberately discussed.

Senator Lodge continues:

> The Senate, I believe—

Here is the man whose bill was defeated by free debate, but listen:

> The Senate, I believe, has never failed to act in any case of importance where a majority of the body really and genuinely desired to have action and the full opportunity for deliberation and discussion characteristic of the Senate has prevented much rash legislation born of the passion of an election struggle and has perfected still more that which ultimately found its way to the statute books.

And then he closes with these words:

> The Members of the U.S. Senate have always cherished the freedom of debate which has existed in this Chamber. Senators have been reluctant to adopt any rule of cloture, and, even after the present rule was adopted in 1917, they have been reluctant to invoke it. Cloture is a gag rule. It shuts off debate. It forces all free and open discussion to come to an end. Such a practice destroys the deliberative function which is the very foundation for the existence of the Senate. It was the intent of the framers of the Federal Constitution to obtain from the upper Chamber of the Congress a different point of view from that secured in the House of Representatives. Thus the longer time, the more advanced age, the smaller number, the equal representation of all States. Careful and thorough consideration of legislation is more often needed than the limitation of debate.

Senator Lodge knew, even as we know, of the temptations and the pressures that come. He knew how a party or a majority in control, perhaps at the moment somewhat intoxicated with its new-found power or perhaps forgetful of the great responsibility of power, may be whipped on by pressure groups or spurred by some political expediency to act without full and complete deliberation and mature consideration and do the very thing against which George Washington warned us.

Some of us here today served in this body with the late Senator Charles L. McNary, of Oregon. He was not only a great Senator, much honored and beloved and esteemed by his colleagues as the leader of his party in the Senate, but we recall he was the Vice Presidential nominee of his party in 1940. This is what he said:

> Every Republican except two were for the bill—

The pending measure then pending before the Senate—> and they were willing to remain here—

That was on the floor of the Senate—

> from sunrise to evening star and from evening star to sunrise in order to have the bill passed. But, Mr. President, I am not willing to give up the right of free speech and full and untrammeled opportunity for argument. That right is the last palladium. It is the last impregnable trench for those who may be oppressed or who are about to be oppressed. It may be the last barrier to tyranny.

If time permitted, I could quote Webster and Hoar, of Massachusetts; Moses, of New Hampshire, the elder La Follette, of Wisconsin; Beveridge, of Indiana; Sherman, of Illinois; Pittman, of Nevada; Johnson and Phelan, of California; George, of Georgia, and many other great Senators of the past in support of free debate in the Senate. Permit me, however, to present a statement from a former distinguished Presiding Officer of the Senate, the late Vice President of the United States, Adlai Stevenson. Vice President Stevenson declared:

> It must not be forgotten that the rules governing this body are founded deep in human experience, that they are the result of centuries of perilous effort in legislative halls to conserve, to render stable and secure the rights and liberties which have been achieved by conflicts. By its rules the Senate wisely fixes the limits of its own powers. To those who clamor against the Senate and its methods of procedure, it may truly be said "they know not what they do." In this Chamber alone are preserved without restraint two essentials of wise legislation and of good government: The right of amendment and of debate.
> Grave evils often result from hasty legislation, rarely from the delay which follows discussion and deliberation. In my humble judgment the historic Senate, preserving the unrestricted right of amendment and of debate, maintaining intact the time-honored parliamentarian methods and means, which unfailingly secure action after deliberation, possesses in our scheme of government a value which cannot be measured by words.

We recall the words of Benjamin Franklin when he was asked what the Constitutional Convention had done. His answer was: "We have given you a republic, if you can keep it." Senators, for some 170 years we have kept this Republic. I am here today pleading with you: Let us continue to keep it. Let us not remove the landmark which our fathers have set.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I am concerned primarily at this point with the serious espousal of the contention that a bare majority should have control of the fate of all measures, and I desire to emphasize the danger inherent in such a contemplation. Consideration must always be given to the rights of substantial minorities, and such consideration is now assured by the institution of full and free debate in the Senate, as guaranteed by rule XXII.

Bare majority rule is no real yardstick by which the wisdom of legislation can be measured.

Substantial opposition to some legislative proposal from a number of States or a large minority of the people affected should always be considered in determining the fate of a legislative proposal.

A bare majority vote in the Senate, while adequate for many measures, does not, in the large sense, determine the majority sentiment of the people.

A majority vote in the United States Senate does not necessarily represent a majority of the States. Senators vote as individuals according to their own convictions, and the necessary absences on important matters have often turned the tide in a close vote.

Both the majority and the minority of the people and the States need the protection of a deliberative rule, rule XXII.

Mr. President, an additional point was recently raised by the columnist Mr. Walter Lippmann when he said:

> The real issue is not whether measures shall be wholly debated. The question is how they can be passed. There is no doubt that 8 or 9 weeks of debate is quite sufficient for any measure, and that after that there is no hope of anybody's mind being changed by the debate itself. The real question is what are you to do with a minority which is not open to being converted by a debate. Under what conditions should you override it?

Mr. President, a great many apt quotations from the Founding Fathers have been cited. Wise as they may have been, they could not anticipate anything like all the developments which would take place in this country almost two centuries later. But the experience of the intervening decades has dictated both the wisdom and the necessity of some rule along the lines of rule XXII, rather than decision by a mere majority rule.

As a practical matter, in the passage of highly important legislation in the economic field, as well as in other fields of activity, the present rules of the Senate are the most powerful ally of a Member of the Senate or a small group of Members of the Senate, whether they have been in the Senate only a day, or a week, or a month, or a year, or 20 years.

There have been notable illustrations of that fact, for instance, in the case of the Colorado River project, wherein, through debate, and through a spirit of compromise and some outright delay, a sounder bill for all of the States involved came forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. STENNIS. May I have 1 more minute?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield 1 more minute to the Senator from Mississippi.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi is recognized for 1 additional minute.

Mr. STENNIS. Another example is the cotton acreage bill, a highly important measure to many cotton producers. A more just distribution of acreage was forced through the Senate by virtue of a liberal rule on debate.

A few years ago the atomic power bill hung in debate for 5 or 6 weeks as a result of the efforts of a relatively small group of Senators, including, I think, the Senator from Illinois. Perhaps I am incorrect in that statement. Anyway, an important small group of Senators forced important compromises and agreements which led to sounder legislation.

In the field of tactical legislation and the adjustment of differences of opinion, as well as in economic proposals, it is this rule of the Senate which has the great power to force saner and sounder and more equitable legislation. It is the greatest ally any Member of the Senate has for proper representation of his State or his area. It makes no difference whether he is a new Senator or whether he has been in the Senate for 20 years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, if the last election was indicative of a mandate at all, it was a mandate for action.

As James Reston said in the New York Times yesterday, the spirit in Washington today is a spirit of "Let's get going."

I was encouraged to hear the speech made by our majority leader last Wednesday, in which he spoke these words:

> It is the indictment of those who presently hold the responsibility of the action arm of our leadership that in dynamic times they have exalted—and still exalt—the static.

Is that not exactly what the filibuster and the possibility of filibuster do in the legislative branch?

It exalts the static. I might say it does so in more ways than one.

These are times, above all, when the Congress of the United States must be able to enact legislation, and enact it without the foot-dragging veto power of a minority.

This is exactly what the Douglas amendment would do.

Mr. President, what we are asking in the Douglas proposal is a very moderate reform, when it is put in the context of how a bill moves through the Congress.

I am sure other Members of this body are far better acquainted with the process than I, but I have noticed in the debate on this issue—and I have read the RECORD very carefully—that there has been little reference to the safeguards against hasty or precipitous or unjust action we presently have.

When a bill is introduced in the House of Representatives it is up to the chairman of the committee to which it is referred to schedule a hearing if he so desires. The hearing may or may not be scheduled. The bill may die right there, and many good bills do die in this way. If a hearing is scheduled, it is then up to a majority of the committee members to decide whether they wish to report the bill favorably. If a majority of the committee thinks not, the bill dies here. Even if the bill is reported, it is necessary to get a rule in regard to the bill from the Rules Committee. The chairman of the Rules Committee may decide, or a majority of the members of the Rules Committee may decide, that they do not want the bill, for some reason, to receive a rule and, as is well known, many controversial bills die at that point. If a rule is granted, it is then up to a majority in the House of Representatives, at long last, to decide whether to pass the bill.

Even now the bill is barely halfway through. The bill must go to the Senate. It will go to a Senate committee. Again the chairman of the committee may decide or may not decide to schedule hearings. If the answer is no hearing, the bill dies here. In the event the hearings are scheduled and the majority of the committee reports the bill favorably, the matter then goes to the policy committee of the majority party in the Senate. If there is any degree of opposition at all, it is up to the policy committee of the Senate to decide whether the bill should come before the Senate for consideration and many bills die here. If the policy committee decides that the bill should be considered, then at last the bill comes to the floor of the Senate. It is only at this point—after careful, conservative scrutiny, that what the Senator from Illinois is asking and what the rest of us are asking would occur—only then would it be possible to limit debate by a determined minority, as pointed out, not to 2 weeks, but to limit debate, in effect, to 8 or 9 or 10 weeks, before a majority of the Senate could act.

After a bill is passed, of course it would be subject to a Presidential veto. Even then, if the bill were an unjust bill in any way it could and would be modified in many ways through its administration. It could and would be appealed by court procedures to square it with our Constitution, or it could be repealed.

The fact is, Mr. President, that we are indeed in a dynamic age, an age in which we must take action if we are going to preserve freedom and if we are going to do the job we must do.

I remind Senators of what our distinguished majority leader pointed out. As he said, it is time that we acted to improve our system of monetary control. Our budgetary processes were formed in another day. Our tax structure is obsolescent. We must not surrender to educational blight. We must not abandon either regions or citizens, of whatever class or age, to despair. There are many other legislative objectives a humane America must achieve.

If we are to achieve these objectives the filibuster is one obstacle to progress which we can and must eliminate.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MORTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois desire to yield time?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time necessary for the calling of the roll will be taken out of the time of the Senator from Illinois. Does the Senator from Illinois understand the time necessary will be taken from his time?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, there are several Senators on our side of the aisle who wish to speak on the proposal who are not present in the Chamber, or whose remarks have not been prepared. I should be very glad to yield some time to our good friends of the other side of the aisle.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Illinois will yield, we are in much the same situation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the very able and distinguished senior Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, the amendment sponsored by a group of bipartisan Senators headed by the able senior Senator from Illinois in my judgment represents a reasonable means by which, after full and free debate upon any issue is indulged in by the Senate, Senators may then agree, as they ought to agree, to proceed to vote, up or down, on the pending business. That, after all, Mr. President, is the reason for parliamentary government; it is the reason for the legislative process. There must come, finally, a decision on public questions.

Mr. President, in the recommendation which is now before the Senate, in which I have been glad to join as an author, it is recognized, first, that after 2 days two-thirds of the Members of the Senate present and voting may impose cloture, but it is also recognized that after 15 legislative days cloture may be imposed by a majority of Senators present and voting.

Fifteen legislative days, Mr. President, represent quite probably 3 or more weeks of debate in the United States Senate. Beyond that, I very much doubt it would be at all reasonable to assume that a Senator would begin agitating for a cloture petition at the opening of a debate on any subject. Thus, from the standpoint of mechanics, I think what is now pending in the Senate is completely reasonable and in the public interest.

More, much more, however, than that is involved in the debate in which we are now participating. The President of the United States in his message to the Congress the other day indicated that he shortly will send us his considered recommendations in the so-called civil rights field. Legislation is necessary in that field, Mr. President. Several days ago I read the text of the recent hearings in the State of Alabama by the Civil Rights Commission. It is tragic but true that in some places in the United States of America today that high-sounding constitutional phrase of "equal protection of the law" is a sham and a mockery, and citizens of the United States have been denied and now are being denied the right to participate in free American elections.

I venture to suggest, Mr. President, that the rollcall on the proposed amendment will go a long way toward determining the fate of the recommendations for civil rights legislation which President Eisenhower shortly will send to the Congress for its approval. I urge my colleagues to support the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from California has expired.

Does the Senator from Illinois desire to yield additional time?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time necessary for the call of the roll will be taken from the time of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time necessary for the calling of the roll not be taken from our time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard. Does the Senator from Illinois still suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I still suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time necessary for the call of the roll will be taken from the time of the Senator from Illinois.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Reserving the right to object, how much time has been used on the quorum call?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has used 14 minutes, and the Senator from Illinois has used 14 minutes, including the time used on the quorum call.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is, on the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. How much time did the quorum call take?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Three minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that that time be charged equally on both sides, to the time on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Is there objection to rescinding the order for the quorum call? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I yield 6 minutes to the very able senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to enable a constitutional majority of the Senate to curb a filibuster.

What is a filibuster? The Encyclopedia Britannica defines it as follows:

> A name originally given to the buccaneers * * * The modern use of the word denotes one who engages in private warfare against any state. In the United States it is colloquially applied to legislators who practice obstruction. * * * Its practice has successfully defeated many pieces of legislation.

So much for what we seek to curb. We oppose private warfare against the United States.

With the exception of Cuba and Brazil, the United States of America was the last country in the civilized world to banish that "peculiar institution," as it came to be known, the institution of human slavery. Today, with the exception of the Union of South Africa, the United States is the only nation in the free Western World which denies to a substantial number of its citizens the equal protection of the laws without regard for race, color, or national origin.

The existence of the filibuster in the U.S. Senate is one reason why our country lags behind other civilized nations in protecting the rights of minorities.

The U.S. Senate is the only legislative body in the civilized world which permits the filibuster. What Woodrow Wilson said in 1917 is equally true in 1959:

> The Senate of the United States is the only legislative body in the world which cannot act when its majority is ready for action.

In 1917, 75 Senators signed a statement saying they would, if they could, vote to arm merchant ships against German aggression but were unable, because of a filibuster to bring the matter to a vote.

If the pending amendment fails, I fear similar statements may have to be signed by as many as 65 Senators in the 86th Congress, expressing our frustration at our failure to pass measures equally vital to our national security and our national well-being.

It must be clear to all objective observers that, if this amendment fails, no meaningful civil rights legislation will pass this Congress despite protestations to the contrary; and yet I think it equally clear that a substantial majority of the Members of this Senate would vote for substantial civil rights legislation if given the chance. That chance, I suggest, will never come if this amendment fails.

But this is not all. Distinguished conservative Members of this body have already stated during this debate that they rely on rule XXII and the filibuster to assist them in their strong opposition to measures which, I am confident, a majority of the Senate—but probably not two-thirds of those voting on a cloture petition—strongly approve. Among those measures are:

First. Legislation making even minimum health and medical services available to elderly American citizens regardless of their economic status. This legislation will be strongly fought by those who, erroneously in my opinion, consider such measures "socialized medicine."

Second. Legislation requiring State unemployment compensation laws to meet minimum national standards in order to protect those thrown out of their jobs through no fault of their own.

Third. Slum clearance, urban redevelopment and housing legislation essential to prevent our great cities from becoming the ghettoes of the second half of the 20th century. This legislation will be strongly fought by those who contend State and local governments can find the money for these projects.

Fourth. Federal legislation which would help shore up our sorely tried educational system and enable it to face up to the Russian challenge. This legislation will be strongly opposed by States Rights advocates and $77 billion budget adherents.

Fifth. Legislation which will probably be necessary to close tax loopholes, balance the Federal budget by providing adequate revenues and thus prevent runaway inflation.

I fear that at least one-third, but not a majority, of the Members of this body are opposed to each of these necessary measures. Yet I suggest that most, if not all, of the newly elected Senators of both parties pledged themselves to support these many programs in their campaigns last fall.

Let me say to them, in all candor, that if they oppose the pending amendment their vote may well prevent effective measures in each of these areas from ever coming to a vote in the Senate of the 86th Congress.

If the pending amendment fails this Senate will have, in effect, prevented the establishment of majority rule on controversial legislation and determined that no hotly contested measure can come to a vote on the Senate floor unless almost two-thirds of the Members of this body feel strongly enough about the matter to sign a cloture petition. The filibuster threat will hand over all such measures until they are watered down or abandoned in committee or on the floor.

Let me again remind my Democratic colleagues of the plank which appeared in our party's platform in both 1952 and 1956. It reads as follows:

> In order that the will of the American people may be expressed upon all legislative proposals we urge that action be taken at the begininng of the Congress to improve congressional procedures so that majority rule prevails and decisions can be made after reasonable debate without being blocked by a minority in either House.

I ran on that platform in 1956. I consider myself bound by it when I vote today. Each Senator is, of course, the guardian of his own conscience and I shall never criticize any Member for any vote he may cast in this Chamber.

Late last Friday night, to an empty press gallery and a deserted Senate Chamber, the new minority whip, the distinguished senior Senator from California, summarized my views on this subject far better than I could when he said:

> The times are too critical, the needs of the Nation too great, to retain any longer an undemocratic anachronism which subjects the Senate to the scorn of world opinion and makes a mockery of the legislative process.

Mr. President, the critical issue this afternoon is clear: Do we want the Senate of the United States to continue to be the only legislative body in the world which cannot act when its majority is ready for action?

I urge support of the pending amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the leadership has no request for time in opposition to the pending proposal. Their views have already been expressed, I assume, and we are prepared to vote whenever it is agreeable to the other side.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was in the rear of the Chamber and did not hear the remarks of the very able majority leader. Am I to understand that he does not wish to have his side debate this amendment any further?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. We have no further requests for time at this time. Later some Senator who wishes time may enter the Chamber, but I have canvassed the situation as thoroughly as possible, and we are prepared to vote.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am deeply disappointed at the failure of the majority leader to produce more defenders of his position; but, of course, we cannot compel Senators to speak if they do not wish to speak, and if they think that by sheer pressure of votes they can get the measure through without discussion. But it is not for me to control the time of the majority leader. Therefore I yield 5 minutes to the very able senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. McNAMARA].

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, there is no doubt that the Senate currently is engaged in one of its most historic debates.

Years from now parliamentarians and students of government will look back on these pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to study the words we are speaking here.

It is my hope that they will see this debate as a turning point, another victory in the continuing fight to further freedom and democracy, and not as just so many wasted words.

In a sense, those of us who have been carrying on this particular fight already have achieved a certain victory.

This can be seen by the fact that longtime opponents to any change in rule XXII are now proposing a change.

They would not be seeking this compromise if they did not feel that the strength on our side of this issue was considerably greater.

However, while progress thus has been made, there is a big difference between just any token change in rule XXII—and the proper change in rule XXII.

We propose that rule XXII be changed so that a constitutional majority of Senators, at least 50 in number, can effect a limitation on debate. But such limitation could be imposed only after a number of parliamentary steps which would actually permit weeks of debate on any issue.

The rule XXII change offered by the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], and other Senators, has been subjected to much distortion in a conscious or unconscious effort to confuse its merits.

However, any fair-minded person who studies its provisions can see that it permits full, fair, and even prolonged debate.

Any rule that can allow up to 8 or 9 weeks of debate on a given issue can hardly be called a gag rule.

Leaving the eventual decision to a majority of the elected Members of the Senate, certainly is far more fair than the virtually meaningless proposal of two-thirds of those present and voting.

Mr. President, the opponents of a meaningful change or any change in rule XXII frequently exercise a strange double standard. They tell us, for example, that it is not necessary for us to change rule XXII to effect civil rights legislation because we got a civil rights bill through in 1957. But that bill, because of their efforts, was far weaker than it should have been.

Yet a study of the RECORD of those days will disclose that some of those who now almost brag about the passage of the Civil Rights Act are those who fought hardest against its passage.

And they seem to forget that they also chastised us for using another Senate rule—rule XIV—to bring that bill to the floor over their determined opposition.

We still have rule XIV, which permits us occasionally to crack the Iron Curtain blocking consideration of civil rights legislation in this body.

Determined Members of the Senate can—and will, if necessary—use every means at their disposal to bring to this floor legislation which insures the first-class citizenship of every American.

But the fact that we have done it—and perhaps can do it again—does not alter the injustice of a situation where an equally determined group of Senators can tie up this Chamber for weeks and months with senseless talk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Michigan has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 3 additional minutes to the Senator from Michigan.
